How can it with any propriety be said that it is the duty of Congress to meet when it has already met? It is a legal absurdity to say that a body that is in session, must meet either constructively or actually, in order to be in session. In order to hold that the session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, which began on November 9, 1903, terminated by operation of law at 12 o'clock noon December 7, 1903, it must be held that although the Fifty-eighth Congress was in full constitutional session at 12 o'clock noon on that day, it was terminated and the session ended in order that, at the same instant of time, the same Congress should be in like full constitutional session—being in session, by operation of law, by one act, and at the same moment of time a session is ended and begun in order that it may be in session when, as a matter of fact, the session is actually continuous. What is there to justify the assertion of this extremely finical and attenuated technical legal proposition? This constructive termination of a session hardly approaches the dignity of a legal fiction, and the law abhors a fiction. It may perhaps tolerate a fiction in order to accomplish some substantial purpose that can not be attained in any other way, but not otherwise. Here the fiction was entirely unnecessary, as the essential result, a session "at least once in every year," had been already achieved. What is there about the Fifty-eighth Congress, that would have assembled at 12 o'clock noon December 7, if it had not already been assembled, that differentiates it from the same Fifty-eighth Congress that met November 9? Absolutely nothing. Has the latter any constitutional power not possessed by the former? None. Can it do anything that the other could not do? Nothing. Is there any legal reason why one is superior to or supersedes the other; why the former should give way to the latter? Absolutely none.

It must be borne in mind that these provisions of the Constitution relating to calling sessions of Congress are in no sense analogous to the by-laws of a corporation providing for the calling of meetings of the corporation. If they were, the provisions requiring Congress to meet on the first Monday of December might be thought parallel to the by-law providing for the annual meeting of the corporation at which officers are to be elected, and such other business transacted as may be specified in the call. Unless so specified, no other business can be transacted. The call for a special meeting of a corporation must specify the business to be transacted at the meeting, and the usual business of the annual meeting, such as the election of officers, could not be transacted at such meeting, because such business is by the by-laws to be considered at a specific meeting, and notice thereof would not be given in the call.

In the case of Congress, however, whether called by the President under the Constitution or meeting at the time specified in the Constitution or at the time appointed by Congress under the Constitution, it meets with the same plenary powers, and is in no sense limited or restrained as to the acts which it can do, by the time when, or the manner in which, it is called together, and there is, therefore, no legal reason why the Fifty-eighth Congress, meeting at the time fixed by the Constitution, in session at noon on December 7, can be held to displace or supersede the Fifty-eighth Congress in session at and prior to that time, meeting equally at the time fixed by the Constitution by virtue of the President's call. In order to overrule the point of order some such legal reason must be given. How is it that Congress, that has the power to change the time fixed for meeting by the Constitution, has not the power to continue its own session beyond the time thus fixed? It has elected to so continue it in this instance.

For the purpose of testing the principle, let us assume that the legislative day of December 5 extended without any recess until 12 o'clock noon on the 7th, at which time a roll call was in progress. Would the roll call be stopped and the session ended because if Congress had not met and was not in session it would have met at that time? If continuing after 12 o'clock, must Congress stop its business and, although it continues to sit, begin anew the consideration of the measure pending, or at least begin a new roll call? This would be the result if the session ended, as that would end the consideration of business pending. Will the Chair hold that a roll call could not be completed under such circumstances, and would not such a holding involve a palpable legal absurdity? The assumed condition might easily occur and is clearly involved in the operation of the proposition, and the Chair must so hold, I submit, in order to overrule the point of order.

So far as the action of Congress is concerned upon this question, the records disclose the following facts: The second session of the First Congress adjourned to meet on the first Monday of December next, which was the constitutional day. The Journal of the session that met on that day shows, however, that they met "on the day appointed by the two Houses for the meeting of the present session," instead of on the day appointed by the Constitution therefor.

In the following instances Congress met in session by virtue of the date fixed by it, by law, under the provision of the Constitution allowing them "to appoint a different day," and continued in session beyond the day that Congress would otherwise have met, as provided in the Constitution, on the first Monday of December:

The first session of the Second Congress;
The second session of the Second Congress;
The second session of the Third Congress;
The second session of the Fifth Congress;
The second session of the Sixth Congress;

The second session of the Eighth Congress;
The second session of the Tenth Congress;
The second session of the Eleventh Congress;
The second session of the Twelfth Congress;
The second session of the Fifteenth Congress; and
The second session of the Sixteenth Congress.

I do not contend, may it please the Chair, that these meetings of Congress under these circumstances are precisely in point upon my present contention, because Congress met then at the time fixed by law, which eliminated, under the terms of the Constitution, the constitutional time fixed for the meeting. But there are other instances that are precisely in point. In the following instances Congress was called in session by a proclamation earlier than the day fixed by the Constitution, and continued in session on that day and beyond that day without making any reference to that date or taking any notice of it, and there was no intimation that Congress was instantaneously adjourned and convened by operation of law:

The first session of the Eighth Congress, the first session of the Tenth Congress, the first session of the Twelfth Congress, and the third session of the Thirteenth Congress. Here are four cases in which Congress, if it may please the Chair, in the early history of the Republic gave a contemporaneous construction of this constitutional provision, and every one of them in the line of, and in harmony with, our contention sustaining the point of order. It is well settled that early and practically contemporaneous construction by legislative action is entitled to much greater weight than action that is remote.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Maine state whether or not any question whatever was raised in the cases he refers to as to the termination of the sessions preceding the regular sessions?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Not as the records disclose. In those cases the question was not even raised. The men in the early days of the Republic assumed that when Congress, called in session by the proclamation of the President, continued beyond the constitutional time otherwise fixed, that it was a continuous session and made one session, and the question was not even raised or suggested.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Maine permit one question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine submit to an interruption?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have not heard all of the gentleman's argument, but this occurs to me as being a pertinent question: All of the bills, all of the resolutions of this session, all of the Journals, are as of the second session?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. How can there be a second session of a body which has not had a first session completed?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will answer that question by asking another one. How can the clerks of the House or the officers of the House change a principle of constitutional law by labeling the bills or the records or the Journals of the House? Of course it tends to show what their opinion was, but in my judgment they can not thus change the constitutional law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. On the line of your argument I want to bring this to your attention: Suppose this Congress now in session should continue until the first Monday in next December, up until 12 o'clock, and then proceed on until the 4th day of next March. Mileage being a sessional appropriation and not an annual appropriation, what would be your opinion as to the mileage for the next session?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The same proposition would apply to it. There would not be any next session so long as this session continues in session, without an adjournment or without a termination by operation of law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to ask the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I should be glad to do this, if the gentleman will allow me: I should like to conclude the suggestions that I have to make and then I will answer any questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that we not only have four Congresses between the Eighth and the Thirteenth where the construction that is now suggested was adopted, I concede without question or controversy—and I certainly have no desire to mislead any Member on this proposition—we not only have four Congresses in the early history of Congress, but we have two cases where Congress has substantially by its action adopted this proposition. The first is the Fortieth Congress. The first session of the Fortieth Congress met as appointed by law on the 4th day of March, 1867, and was in session on November 26, 1867, when the following resolution was presented in the Senate by Senator Grimes, of Iowa:

Resolved by the Senate (the House concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House do adjourn their respective Houses without day on Monday, the 2d of December next, at half past 11 o'clock a. m.

Senator Sumner moved to amend the resolution by making the hour 12 o'clock, giving as a reason that Congress might not safely adjourn, for even so small a time, lest the President, who was thought by him to be unpatriotic, should improve the intervening time to issue commissions. He thought, therefore, that one session should come close up to the other, and that one should end when the other began.

His amendment was agreed to and the resolution as amended was adopted, and in pursuance thereof on Monday, the 2d of December, the presiding officers of the two Houses declared the Houses adjourned without day at 12 o'clock, and immediately thereafter they were called to order in the second session, and the roll was called by States.

Now, I ask the Chair to note this: If it had been true that by operation of law that Congress would have expired at 12 o'clock noon, was it necessary to adopt a concurrent resolution providing for adjournment at that time? Clearly not. Evidently the men who were in the Senate, Senator Sumner and Senator Grimes, assumed that without such action on the part of the Houses adjourning at that time Congress would have continued by operation of law, because otherwise there would have been no occasion for the adoption of the resolution.

Now let me go a little further, because it assumes the correctness of the legal proposition on which we rely. On October 15, 1877, the Forty-fifth Congress met in special session on the call of the President and remained in session until the first Monday in December, the day appointed by the Constitution for the regular assembling thereof. On Saturday, December 1, Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, offered the following resolution, which was adopted by the House:

Resolved (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to adjourn their respective Houses without day at 3 o'clock p. m. this day.

Thereafter on that day the House took a recess until 10 o'clock a. m. of the calendar day of Monday, December 3, the day prescribed by the Constitution for the meeting of the regular session of Congress. The Senate took a recess on the same day to the same hour on December 3. At that time—December 3, at 10 a. m.—immediately on the approval of the Journal of the Senate, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, offered this resolution, which was agreed to without debate:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the judgment of the two Houses that the present session of Congress expires by operation of law at 12 o'clock meridian this day.

That resolution, I state frankly to the Chair, is precisely in point against our contention. It was adopted in the Senate without debate; it was concurred in by the House without debate, and so far as the record discloses without the slightest consideration, investigation, or deliberation. It was, at the most, purely academic. Although Senator Edmunds was a great lawyer, in the hurry and turmoil of that stage of a session, so far as we know, the resolution may have been drawn on the spur of the moment, and may not express his well-considered opinion. But there is other action taken in the same Congress that is absolutely inconsistent with this academic declaration upon the law relating to the ending of the session of Congress.

The Senate went on after that, after this resolution had been agreed to, the resolution in relation to the declaration of the law—after that resolution had been agreed to the Senate took up the former resolution of the House as to adjournment, disagreed to it, and adopted an amendment striking out "3 o'clock p. m. this day" and inserting "11.50 a. m. the 3d of December instant," and the House concurred in the amendment. Then the Houses agreed to the usual resolution authorizing the appointment of a committee to notify the President of the United States that Congress had adjourned, and the Speaker then declared the House adjourned.

Now, I ask the Chair to note this when he comes to rule upon this question. Here is an academic resolution that passed the Senate and passed the House without debate, without deliberation, a resolution that accomplished nothing, resulted in no action of any kind; and after the passage of that resolution, although that resolution declared that Congress would expire by constitutional limitation by virtue of law, after the adoption of this resolution the two Houses, placing no confidence in their own declaration, not relying upon their legal proposition, passed the joint resolution adjourning Congress, and then adjourned in pursuance of the resolution without day and met in the next session after ten minutes. But if their academic resolution had been sound law, they would have adjourned, or the session would have terminated by operation of law, without their last resolution. If their first resolution was sound, why clearly the second was unnecessary and entirely a work of superogation. While their dictum is against us their decisive legal action the only precedent established, is by obvious construction, precisely in point in our favor.

So I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is no adverse legal precedent in the history of the Congress of the United States, and I challenge the production of one that can in any sense militate against the proposition suggested in behalf of this point of order. On the other hand, every precedent sustains it. These two cases to which I have called the attention of the Chair by necessary implication adopt the legal proposition relied upon to sustain this point of order. The action of Congress during four Congresses during the early part of its history adopted this theory without any question.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, I simply present this as a legal proposition. I have not the slightest feeling about it one way or the other. I believe, my own judgment is, that as a matter of law this appropriation for this session, one appropriation already having been made for this session, is not authorized by any existing law. I do not believe, inasmuch as this Congress never has undertaken to adjourn, that it has been terminated by the operation of any such finical, attenuated, unsubstantial, technical legal proposition as that suggested, and which must be relied upon in order to establish the alleged interim, and therefore I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have been very much interested in the gentleman's argument and now will ask him if an "end" to a session of Congress is not contemplated by this provision of the Constitution. I read from the Constitutional Manual, page 23:

> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

The word "end" is here used—"end of their next session"—that is, the Senate at least.

Now, suppose the President during the interim made a temporary appointment during the "recess," and the Senate refused (I do not allude to any particular case) to ratify the nominations thus made—two-thirds not voting, but a majority of the Senate or a majority of the Congress should force a continuous session—does the Constitution allow the Senate or Congress to do this? This would allow the President to foist upon the country temporary appointees whom the Senate—two-thirds—refuse to indorse, ratify.

Couple this provision of the Constitution with the other, "Congress shall meet once every year," are we not forced to conclude that sessions of Congress are ended by the Constitution and must in law at least begin and end sessions, and that Congress must meet "once every year" and must therefore end its sessions at least once "every" year, otherwise great confusion would follow.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is assuming that Congress continues in session during the whole two years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; that it just continues along.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Of course that would be a very violent assumption. Now, I am very glad to hear the gentleman state that he does not understand that there is any particular case to be affected by his interrogation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; not at all, I assure the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have perhaps an indefinite impression there may be other cases pending elsewhere that might be affected by any suggestion we might make, and far be it from me to make any suggestion or reflection——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, no; I do not desire that at all.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. As I was saying, far be it from me to express any opinion upon a hypothetical proposition which might be construed directly or indirectly as a reflection upon another branch of Congress—a coordinate branch of this great body.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am afraid that if that remained as the law of the land and Congress were opposed to the President it could go along and refuse to confirm nominations of the President until many public and high offices would be filled by temporary or recess appointments, condemned by two-thirds of the Senate refusing to confirm them. This would be deplorable, but continuous sessions would do this very thing, it seems to me.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is just exactly what Congress did in 1867, when they adjourned at 12 o'clock noon. They did adjourn by their own action, and they accomplished the very purpose which seems to fill my friend with apprehension. I say it is possible for Congress to do it in that way also. I have no doubt of its power to accomplish the result in that way.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The President has certain rights under the Constitution, and this is one of them, and Congress, by acting in the way you say, might rob the President of his Executive prerogative.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That was a matter for that Congress which sat then, and I will not waste time commenting upon that or expressing an opinion as to the propriety of the action. That is what it did, and it is what they could do again.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman cites the Forty-fourth Congress. Was it necessary for that Congress to adjourn by joint resolution because it could not continue, owing to the fact that so far as some Members of both Houses were concerned their term of office had expired?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, your question might apply to the Senate, because the term of a Member of the House could not expire at irregular periods, of course.

Mr. SHERLEY. Say the 4th of March.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That might apply to the Senate. Well, the 4th of March would not involve the proposition so far as the first Monday in December is concerned, because it is too far removed from it.

Mr. SHERLEY. But it might apply so far as the Senate was concerned.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, you would hardly have a continuous session of the Fifty-eighth Congress after it had expired by constitutional limitation and the Fifty-ninth had come in. You could not get together the Fifty-ninth Congress by calling it during the period of the Fifty-eighth.

Mr. SHOBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. SHOBER. Suppose by any chance—this being a hypothetical question also—suppose the President of the United States should call or had called, as he did, the Senate in special session, and had called the whole Congress of the United States together on March 5, and this Fifty-eighth Congress had remained in special session for two whole years, until the terms of the Members of the Congress had expired. I would like to ask the gentleman in that case what sort of a session it would be, and how it could be reconciled with the provision of the Constitution that there shall be two regular sessions, beginning on the first Monday of December?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think when the Constitution of the United States requires that Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, that if it is assembled on every one of the 365 days it has assembled at least once in that year. Three hundred and sixty-five days would be 365 times once.

Mr. SHOBER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask, in that event, how could you have two sessions when there is a continuous session from one end to the other?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I do not think that necessarily follows.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Will the gentleman from Maine yield to me for a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. With pleasure.

Mr. McDERMOTT. I understand the contention of the gentleman from Maine to be that we are now in the same session that we were in in November?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. McDERMOTT. My understanding of the Constitution is that there are two kinds of sessions of Congress. One what might be called the President's session, the other the constitutional session. The constitutional session has this provision in the Constitution, that neither House shall adjourn for more than three days without the consent of the other. Now, the session of Congress which I may designate as the Presidential session is under the control of the Executive. I call the gentleman's attention to page 23, section 3, of the book that he has in his hand.

On extraordinary occasion on which the President may convene both Houses in case of disagreement between them in respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper. Now, if there has not been in its relation to the Executive any change in the session—in other words, if it is not another sitting as contemplated by the Constitution—then the President can adjourn Congress to-day to such time as he think fit, if there be a disagreement.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say this, because I think it is a pertinent and proper question. I will say that I do not think that clause has special reference, or is confined, to an extraordinary session, so called. It certainly is not confined to the special or extraordinary session in terms. I see no reason why it should be confined to the special session. A deadlock in what may be termed a regular session is attended by the same inconveniences as a deadlock in a special session; and if it is important to remove it in one case it is equally important in the other.

If it was within the power of the President to adjourn the special session without day, and thus produce a recess or an interregnum between what you may call his session and the so-called regular session, I can see force in confining it to the special session. But this power is not conferred upon him. In that case it would be applicable to the special session, because it might be said that he had in that event the power to destroy what he had created. But he has no such power, and therefore no such reason applies.

There is no such thing as an extraordinary session. The Fifty-eighth Congress meets when an extraordinary occasion exists upon which the President bases his call. But if the contention of the gentleman from New Jersey applies, unless it creates a constitutional distinction between the two sessions it does not affect the proposition pending before the House. Why? Because it does not give him the power to adjourn Congress without day, and that is the question involved here, whether this Congress has ever adjourned without day. It is a matter of very little consequence whether he would still have the power in case of a disagreement between the two Houses to adjourn us from time to time. Does the gentleman get my idea?

Mr. McDERMOTT. I get the gentleman's idea, but it seems to me that it does not advance the argument. The President has no power to intervene unless the session is an extraordinary one. In other words, the President's session is to be held until they agree to adjourn, or until he tells them to adjourn. The question can not arise at a regular session. The President of the United States can not adjourn Congress as it is now constituted. We can remain in session for two years, from one session to another, and he can not adjourn it. Therefore the session which is called by the President of the United States has a constitutional distinction from that session which is called by the Constitution itself.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Where does the gentleman find in the Constitution that provision that undertakes to take care of the disagreement between the two Houses in a regular session, or isn't there any such provision?

Mr. McDERMOTT. Simply this, that you shall not adjourn for more than three days unless by agreement. It is not that you shall not adjourn for more than three days unless by agreement, provided that if you do not agree and the Executive thinks you should have agreed, he can fix the date of adjournment.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does that apply to the regular session?

Mr. McDERMOTT. Why, no; but it does to the President's or extraordinary session.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, in the special session does the other provision apply to it?

Mr. McDERMOTT. In the special session you can not adjourn for more than three days without an agreement between the Houses. That would seem to apply; but if you do not agree to adjourn and the Executive desires to interfere, it being his session, he may interfere. Therefore, in the relation that we bear to the Constitution, there is an entirely different aspect between what is known as an extraordinary session and the session called by the Constitution. This was recognized last December by the President of the Senate when he adjourned the Senate. He declared that the Senate was adjourned by lapse of time. In other words, the Constitution having demanded that Congress shall meet on a certain Monday in December, that then meeting in accordance with that demand of the Constitution, Congress was then under the Constitution and not in a Presideutial session under the direction and power of the Executive. That is the difference between the two propositions, in my view.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is the difference between the two Congresses in the gentleman's view, as I understand it.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Inasmuch as your suggestions involve the whole question I do not see how it tends to militate against the proposition, if I am correct in my reasoning.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question. Are we now in session on the call of the President or under the provision of the Constitution requiring us to convene on the first Monday in December?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think we are in session, Mr. Chairman, by virtue of the provision of the Constitution that authorizes the President to call Congress in session on an extraordinary occasion.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. We are not in session under the authority of both. We must be in session either under the call of the President or under the constitutional provision.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Each has constitutional authority.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Certainly; but we are not now in session under both, are we?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, no; I do not think we are.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, which is it, then?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think we are in session under the call of the President.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What became of the duty put upon us by the Constitution? Have we violated it?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; that duty was already performed, and it was unnecessary to again perform it. Now, the law does not require a man to do an absurd or an impossible or an unnecessary thing.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. One further question. I apprehend, as we are proceeding now, unless the two Houses agree on a resolution to adjourn, we would continue in session until the 4th of March, next year, would we not?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Most certainly we would, either under a regular or a special session.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. If we could not agree on a time to adjourn in a special session, the President could adjourn us to some day in the future, could he not?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. He may possibly adjourn us, under that provision of the Constitution, from time to time.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Can he do it as we are now proceeding?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not see why not if we do not agree.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Where is the constitutional power for that? I do not think there is any.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAWNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10954, the urgent deficiency bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REMOVAL OF SNOW AND ICE FROM THE STREETS.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. —) to provide for the removal of snow and ice from the streets, cross walks, and gutters of the District of Columbia.

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, for the removal of snow and ice from the streets, cross walks, and gutters in the District of Columbia; one half of said sum to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the other half out of the Treasury of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk has just read. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire whether this resolution has been referred to any standing committee?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. The resolution was considered by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having charge of the appropriations for the District of Columbia. I also conferred with a number of other members of the general committee, and hope that under the circumstances the measure will meet the prompt concurrence of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman whether the full subcommittee was in attendance and whether the report was unanimous?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. The subcommittee was present in its entire membership, except one; and the report was unanimous, both sides being represented.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to inquire whether this is the amount usually appropriated under these circumstances, or is it in excess of that?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. The amounts have varied all the way from $1,000 to $20,000. The Commissioners in this case asked for $10,000; but inasmuch as Congress is in session and can meet any succeeding emergency as it may arise, we concluded to recommend an appropriation of $5,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. COWHERD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether there has not been a similar appropriation made this session?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. There has been.

Mr. COWHERD. Has that appropriation been spent? As I remember, the bill making the appropriation did not get through until after the snow had, to a large extent, melted.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. The gentleman is in error. That is very rare for him, and hence I take the liberty of mentioning it.

Mr. COWHERD. Has that appropriation been spent?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I am advised by the president of the Board of Commissioners that the last of that money will be expended this afternoon. It is for to-morrow and succeeding days that this money is needed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution? The Chair hears none.

The House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 4115. An act granting an increase of pension to Joseph S. Young;

H. R. 2991. An act granting an increase of pension to Lydia A. Topping;

H. R. 5177. An act granting an increase of pension to William H. Clark;

H. R. 5005. An act granting an increase of pension to Worthington S. Lock;

H. R. 7002. An act granting an increase of pension to James S. Rearden;

H. R. 2616. An act granting an increase of pension to Joseph K. Welt;

H. R. 2640. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas Kelly;

H. R. 2042. An act granting an increase of pension to Alvin B. Hubbard;

H. R. 1856. An act granting an increase of pension to Alexander H. Covert;

H. R. 3743. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles E. Foley;

H. R. 864. An act granting an increase of pension to Albert Moulton;

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 30, 1904.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. TAWNEY in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10954) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest yesterday to the learned and able discussion by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] on the point of order now before the committee. I recognize the fact that he is a great lawyer and that his opinion is entitled to much weight with this committee. But I must differ with him in the conclusion he reaches upon the point before the committee. I agree with him fully as to his first statement, that the only question that can be raised upon this point of order or before this committee is whether or not this is the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress or whether we are now in the first session, because that session was as much a regular session as any session of Congress that could be held.

If we are now in the second or so-called "regular" session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, then I agree with him that there can be no question that it was the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to include in the bill reported by that committee this appropriation for the mileage of Members at this session.

But I differ with him on the other proposition, that we are now in the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. My opinion is that that session, called by the President, upon an extraordinary occasion, came to an end at the hour of 12 o'clock noon on the 7th day of December, when we were, under the Constitution, and have ever since been in another, the regular or second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

This so-called "regular" session is provided for by the Constitution of the United States, which declares that the Congress shall meet on the first Monday in December. We did meet upon that day in the regular or constitutional session; and no matter how the extraordinary session ended, it had come to an end; and that is not a matter of argument simply, but it is a matter of judicial decision, I think, in every State of this Union.

I will cite an illustration which seems to me to be absolutely conclusive upon that question. Every lawyer in this House knows, as to the proceedings of courts, that there may be a special session of court, for instance, or it may be a regular session of court, and that session may run up to the very moment when another session of that court, provided for by law, must be held.

Would the gentleman say that processes returnable to the regular term of court could be held to be void because there was no such term; and when the time came would not that court be in session for the regular term as provided by law? Would not jurors be compelled to appear there at and for that regular term as summoned; and would not all the proceedings of that term of court be as of the regular term of court sitting for that time? And would not the first term have lapsed by operation of law?

That, I think, is so held everywhere. In all of the great cities one term of court runs right up to the very time when another term of court, provided for by law, is to commence. And when that term arrives—the January term, for instance—from that moment the court is in session as of the January term, and all the rules of the court apply as of that term. Jurors come there to that term. Suppose, for instance, that one man, or more than one, had been upon the jury of the term before and was also summoned to appear there as of that term. He would be bound again to appear at the January term, for instance, commencing upon the day fixed by law. He would be entitled to his mileage for that term, and the whole proceedings, from the time that the regular term must convene under the law, would be as of that term. There would be two separate and distinct terms of court. The term which lapsed by law would be the first and not the subsequent term.

So with legislative bodies. It matters not how a former session may have come to an end. I contend that, so far as this House at least was concerned, the extraordinary session came to an end when we adjourned on Saturday, the 5th day of December, without day; and when we met here on Monday, the 7th day of December, we met in the regular or constitutional session of Congress, provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and from that day and from that hour all proceedings of this Congress have been as of the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, the regular session provided for by the Constitution.

Suppose, for instance, that under the power granted to the President of the United States, upon a disagreement between the two Houses as to the adjournment of that session, he had adjourned Congress until the 15th day of December, as he might have done, and suppose that Congress then came together here, as we were bound to do under the Constitution, on the 7th day of December at noon. What session of this Congress would it have been? Manifestly the regular or constitutional session, as distinguished from the extraordinary session, which had adjourned to a time beyond the constitutional date for the convening of the regular session.

As a legal proposition, and without interest or feeling in the matter in any other way, I contend that there can be no doubt, upon the argument made by the gentleman from Maine himself, that we are now in the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and the Committee on Appropriations had no discretion but to provide for this appropriation. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, this is a question which is addressed to the legal conscience of the Chairman of this committee and of each one of its members. It is to be governed by law. The law is to be expounded by common sense, by its reason, and its purpose, and, expounding that law in that way, I believe that there has been but one session of this Congress and that this appropriation is not authorized by law.

The law, in addition to $5,000 a year, gives to each Member mileage coming to and returning from each regular session. I find no difficulty in the word "regular." It is not confined, in my judgment, to the annual session. "Regular" means governed by rules; and whether we come here on the call of the President or by reason of the annual meeting, we come here in pursuance of the rules of the Constitution, and therefore the session is regular. It is easy, however, to see why that word was placed in the statute. Congress itself, without the consent of the President, by concurrent resolution, can adjourn now for one month and go home. It would not be a regular session when we came back again; it would be an adjourned session, taking its force not from the rules established by the Constitution, which make it regular and force attendance, but from the action of the House, which can by no means confer upon itself mileage.

I therefore dismiss, so far as my mind is concerned, the suggestion that there can be no mileage for a session called upon an extraordinary occasion. But——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow a question there?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Has the gentleman examined the history of this statute at all?

Mr. PARKER. No, sir.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think if the gentleman would he would find—I looked at it this morning—that in 1852 the word "regular" was used, and it was used in contradistinction to the word "extra." It said:

> No mileage shall be allowed for an extra session.

And then used the word "regular," thus showing that when it began the word "regular" was used in contradistinction to the word "extra."

Mr. PARKER. It seems to me, however, and I submit to the gentleman that when they left out the provision in the new statute that no mileage should be allowed for an extra session they meant to avoid that construction and meant to allow mileage for any session which we were forced to attend, because mileage is for compulsory attendance and for nothing else.

Now, in common sense, however, and in a common-sense construction of the statute, we have been in continuous session since the 9th day of November.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. PARKER. For a question, yes, with pleasure.

Mr. THAYER. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey how he explains this position on the theory that we are now in continuous session? The first article of the Constitution, section 4, in the last clause, provides:

> The Congress shall assemble at least once every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

Does that give any authority to the President of the United States, or place any authority anywhere, to say that we shall be relieved from gathering here on the first Monday in December, unless we appoint another day? And if so, are we not now in the session provided for by the Constitution?

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman is simply anticipating what I am coming to. There is no difficulty whatever upon that score in my mind, and if the gentleman will listen to the end of what I have to say, if I have not answered, I will then answer.

We met in a regular session, although upon an extraordinary occasion, on the 9th day of November. We assembled, and there was a meeting of Congress. From day to day, by ordinary adjournment of not exceeding three days, we assembled and met until the 7th day of December, and the 8th day of December, and until the present time.

Mr. THAYER again rose.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman pardon me? I do not wish to be interrupted in the middle of my statement. I thought the gentleman understood my position, that I wished him to wait until I finish what I have to say. I would like to answer him then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey declines to yield.

Mr. PARKER. We assembled and met from day to day. On the Saturday previous we adjourned to assemble and meet upon the 7th day of December. We met on the morning of the 7th day of December. When we assembled and met on that 7th day of December we did it in pursuance of that adjournment. We did it also in pursuance of a duty imposed by the Constitution to meet on that day. The fact that we had a new sanction for meeting upon that day did not destroy the fact that we had adjourned to that day and continued our session. We had performed our duty by the adjournment to that day. The sanction of the Constitution confirms our action. That adjournment was in accordance with the statute that we should assemble and meet upon that day, and that continuance was that to which we were bound by law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to ask the gentleman to explain this action on the part of the House: When we met on the first Monday in December we notified the Senate that we were now organized and ready for business; we notified the President that we were now organized and ready for business. If that was a continuous session, why did we do that?

Mr. PARKER. I understand the gentleman's question, and I can give him an answer that is perfectly complete. We did it to take every precaution. We could not adjourn the session that existed, except by the joint, concurrent action of both Houses. It could not be adjourned without day.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky rose.

Mr. PARKER. I ask the gentleman to please wait until I am done. I have asked not to be interrupted. I told one gentleman I wished him to wait, and I shall have to ask the gentleman from Kentucky to wait.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PARKER. I say we adjourned by the simple action of this House. The Senate adjourned at the same time. There was no concurrent resolution by both Houses such as would have made an adjournment of Congress without day. It was simply the adjournment of each House to that day on which they had to assemble and meet, and in which they did assemble and meet, with two sanctions for such an assemblage—one the adjournment, the other the order of the Constitution that we should meet on that day—two sanctions which were not inconsistent the one with the other.

The Constitution simply confirmed the action that we had taken. Now, I will go one step further. It is not merely a question of money or of mileage. I know nothing about existing conditions, but I will say, as a matter of principle, that the Constitution orders that all appointments to office made by the President, when Congress is not in session—and in this great Government there are many—shall remain until the adjournment of the Senate. It was intended that that body should have full time and that in its discretion it should take such time as it thought necessary for the consideration of such nominations. It would be a very bad construction of the Constitution, so far as results are concerned, if by a mere technicality of law, after less than one month, the Senate is to be held adjourned against its will as the clock struck 12, making it impossible for nominations to be sent in during any vacation except by a rush, and making it necessary to renominate, instead of going on with deliberation on the nominations already in their hands until concluded. I submit that the fact that they met on the next day or on the same day, by warrant of a new sanction in pursuance of a new duty, did not vacate the fact that they met in pursuance of the adjournment. I will go one step further and am ready to contend, though without so much certainty——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. PARKER. Not now. I am ready to contend, though without so much certainty in that connection, that when the law spoke of the session it meant a session in fact; it means a sitting; it means a continuous sitting; it does not involve the question whether it is authorized in one way or in another; it means such a sitting as forces a man to come from his home and forces him to stay here until he goes back again. I submit that to allow mileage for the time that the clock was striking 12, to go 3,000 miles to the other side of the continent and to come back, was not intended by the law, which spoke of the reality of a regular session or sitting and not of a fictitious interval between two sessions or sittings, and that the law therefore must be construed by its purpose, which was to provide for possible travel, the movement of a man with his family and belongings during a real vacation of Congress, and not a fictitious move during the time of that adjournment. We have talked of horses and carriages for official use, Mr. Chairman. I submit that no ruling should be made which will allow a mileage for fictitious travel, for it is only a fiction if it be done.

It is brought before us that at one time in our history there was a concurrent resolution for adjournment without day for only a few minutes. The gentleman from Maine, who has been over the records, may be able to tell me whether mileage was allowed for the hours of the adjournment at that time; but whether there was or no, that adjournment at that time, as everyone in the House knows and as stated in the debate, was taken under circumstances of great public urgency, where the Senate and the House were not in agreement with the President, and where it was feared that something wrong might happen during the time of the adjournment. That is not the sort of precedent that should govern. The precedents that should govern this House are the precedents of which there are so many, absolutely uncontradicted—precedents following what I consider to be the absolute governing law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the gentlemen of the committee to pardon anything that I have said that seems too earnest. Each man's conscience, each man's opinion, is his own, and he has a right to it. I am only urging considerations which have governed me and have led me, with great reluctance, fearing that I might say something that might offend the honest judgment of my fellows, to believe that this point of order is well taken; and now, Mr. Chairman, I am ready to answer any questions that gentlemen may desire to ask of me.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER. I will answer the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. In view of the fact that the President of the Senate adjourned the Senate at 12 o'clock on the 7th day of December, with the remark that the special or extraordinary or called session, whatever it may be designated, had expired, because Congress now assembled under the clause of the Constitution requiring it to assemble on Monday; and in view of the fact that both Houses had a regular call of the Members of the respective Houses, in this House by States and a roll call in the Senate, to ascertain if a quorum was present, and the fact that the present presiding officers of each House, and especially this House, because we are more concerned in this House than the other, declared that a quorum had assembled; and in view still further of the fact that the House adopted a resolution notifying the Senate that a quorum of the House had appeared, and also appointed a committee to join a committee from the Senate to inform the President of the United States that the two Houses had assembled and a quorum was present, and asking if he had any communication to make, and receiving the message; and in view of the fact that the Journal of the House, the files of the House, have recognized every day since the 7th of December that this was the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, is it not rather late now to ask the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House to rule that the House in its determination has been all wrong since the 7th day of December, and that now we must go back and hold that this is the called session and not the constitutionally provided date session of the Fifty-eighth Congress?

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I find no difficulty in the question propounded. The statement of the President of the Senate was a statement of his individual opinion at that time, and it binds neither the Senate nor ourselves. I know from the debates since then, and especially from a careful argument upon another subject by the Senator from Maine, that many other Senators do not agree with him in that construction.

The other matters mentioned—the calling of the roll, the sending to the President, the keeping of the Journals of the House—are all matters which may very well be done every day. There are many legislative bodies in which the roll is called every day, and when we have much business here we have it called a good deal. The roll was called on the day upon which we had to be here, and upon which it was essential that we should be here, and was proper in order to show that a quorum was present, because on that day we began to act under a second sanction and under a second duty, as well as by the duty imposed upon us by the adjournment of the previous session. The message to the President was to show that that duty had been especially performed on that particular day, but it was no less a continuance of the previous session that assembled and met on that day.

Mr. PAYNE. It signified nothing that we notified the President that the two Houses had assembled on that day?

Mr. PARKER. It signified this: That we notified him that we had assembled, according to our duty under the law, and it was also an assembling made necessary by the adjournment on the previous day.

Mr. PAYNE. How about the Journal, which says this is the second session?

Mr. PARKER. The Journal of this House does not have the force of a concurrent resolution, and the statement as to whether this is the first or second session is one of those things which is simply a matter of formality.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it not the only evidence that the court looks at to see what the action of the House was?

Mr. PARKER. Yes; but it is merely a designation.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman from New Jersey yield to me?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey if it is not the fact, as he understands it, that when Congress is in session, regular or extraordinary session, either House may, under the Constitution, without the consent of the other, adjourn for a period not exceeding three days?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Would you say that this House on the 5th of December could have lawfully adjourned until the 8th of December, notwithstanding the constitutional mandate that Congress should assemble on the 7th of December, which was the first Monday?

Mr. PARKER. No; we could not adjourn to the 8th of December, because we were ordered to assemble on the 7th. I said that we had a double sanction for assembling—one the adjournment, and the other by the Constitution. We assembled to meet on that day as we did on all previous days, but with a new sanction, and, as matter of fact, the session was continuous.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER. I will.

Mr. THAYER. I want to ask a question, but perhaps in this conversation that has taken place on the other side the point may have been brought out. I want to set the gentleman right when he said that we had adjourned from time to time until 12 o'clock, December 7, the extraordinary session. The record of this House shows that on December 5 the Speaker declared this House adjourned—not until 12 o'clock on Monday, not sine die, not to any time or any particular time, but he declared it adjourned, and there is no record that it ever reconvened. The record of the Senate shows that upon December 7 they adjourned sine die before they commenced the regular session, which began on the 7th of December.

I merely wanted to set him right on that, and then, if he has time, I would like to go back and ask him the question I first asked relative to the Constitution in this matter, a subject upon which, if he spoke, I did not hear one word.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The RECORD shows the same thing in reference to every day.

Mr. PARKER. I am told that the RECORD shows the same thing with reference to adjournment on every day; but I want to say that we know perfectly well ourselves that the session of December 5 was continued to the 7th of December.

Mr. THAYER. I want to ask the gentleman if, so far as was in the power of this House, on Saturday, December 5, we did not adjourn and never reconvene?

Mr. PARKER. We adjourned, as we did on every Saturday, which carries us over to the next Monday at 12 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the question that I desire to ask has been substantially asked by some other gentlemen. Now, I agree with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr.

PARKER] that by the terms of the Constitution Congress was required to convene at 12 o'clock on Monday, December 7. My question is this: Was not our adjournment on the previous Saturday, the 5th of December, to an impossible time? And is not an adjournment to an impossible time tantamount to an adjournment sine die? For instance, if we should adjourn——

Mr. PARKER. One moment. We adjourned to a possible date, a legal date, and a necessary date, namely, December 7.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No, sir. The proposition I make is this, that the Constitution fixed Monday, December 7, as the time when a session of Congress should begin.

Mr. PARKER. No.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. It does not?

Mr. PARKER. No; it says we shall assemble and meet on that day, and we adjourned so as to assemble and meet on that day; but it does not say we shall begin on that day.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is the difference between "tweedledum and tweedledee." The proposition may be illustrated more clearly in this statement: Suppose that on the 2d day of March, before the expiration of our term, the Congress should undertake to adjourn to the 5th of March. Would not that operate as an adjournment sine die.

Mr. PARKER. We can not make an adjournment sine die without the concurrent action of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If the House were to adjourn under its power to adjourn three days at a time on the 2d day of March to the 5th of March, would not that then operate as a sine die adjournment of the House?

Mr. PARKER. We would have no power to meet on the 5th of March, after our term of office should expire, and therefore it would be sine die.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is the point I make.

Mr. PARKER. We would have power to meet on the 7th day of December, as we did, and when we adjourned to that time we simply fulfilled our duty under the law to meet on that day, and the adjournment was valid, because it was in pursuance of law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, as has been many times said during this debate, the only question involved here is as to the proper construction to be put upon these two provisions of the Constitution, one regulating the convening of an extraordinary or special session of Congress and the other providing for the annual or regular session of Congress to meet on the first Monday in December. As to the taking of the mileage, that is a question for each man to answer for himself. I have not been at my home since the convening of the special session, and I have therefore made up my mind what to do if the mileage is voted.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] understand that under the statute this sum of money called "mileage" has anything to do with the traveling of the member? Or is it a part of the compensation added to the $5,000 a year?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I presume that may be so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman just permit me to read the words of the statute of 1866, section 17:

And be it further enacted, That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $5,000 per annum, to be computed from the date of the present Congress, and in addition thereto, mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, etc.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to refer to the argument made by the distinguished gentleman and lawyer from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], in which he said that the Constitution does not provide for an extraordinary session of Congress, nor for a regular session, and that there is no distinction between sessions; that they are all alike. Mr. Chairman, I beg to differ with the gentleman from Maine on that proposition. The word "extraordinary" is used in the Constitution in this connection:

He (the President) may on extraordinary occasions convene both Houses or either of them.

If the President "on an extraordinary occasion" convenes both Houses, it is an extraordinary session of Congress.

In Webster's Unabridged Dictionary he defines the word "extraordinary" as "not usual, not regular." An extraordinary session is therefore a session which is not a regular session. And would it not be a most remarkable thing, Mr. Chairman, if Alexander Hamilton and James Madison and Benjamin Franklin and George Washington and their compatriots had assembled at Philadelphia in that wonderful Constitutional Convention and forgot to provide for a regular session of Congress? If they had not provided in the Constitution for a regular session of Congress, then all would have been left to the discretion of the President, and should he chance to be a man of the ideas and of the disposition of Charles I, Congress would not assemble during his term of office. Not to have provided in the Constitution for a regular session of Congress would have been to open the way to tyranny in the United States. Did that Constitutional Convention then fail to make provision for a regular session of Congress? No language could be plainer than this phraseology in the Constitution:

Congress shall assemble at least once in every year—

That is, Congress shall assemble at least annually—

and such meeting—

That is, such annual meeting—shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they—shall by law appoint a different day.

The language is mandatory. The meeting must be on the first Monday in December, and the first Monday in December comes as regularly as the world revolves around the sun or turns upon its axis.

Under the Constitution, as regularly as comes the first Monday in December, Congress must assemble, unless a different day is appointed by law.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] hit the point in this case. I had intended to present and to elaborate it before he put the question to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER]. I will put it in a little different form: On Saturday (the 5th day of December) preceding the first Monday (the 7th day of that month) could the House and the Senate by concurrent resolution have adjourned over the holidays, as they subsequently did during the regular session? Clearly, no; because such an adjournment would have been in direct disregard of this mandatory requirement of the Constitution that Congress "shall assemble on the first Monday in December" in every year, unless Congress itself has enacted a law appointing a different day, and there is no such law.

Such a law might have been either a statute, or a joint resolution signed by the President; but on Saturday, the 5th day of last December, Congress was still in the special session, called by proclamation of the President. This special session had begun on the 9th day of November. Having met on the 9th day of November, we were in special session until the special session ended; and it ended when the mandate of the Constitution that we shall meet in regular annual session on the first Monday of December took effect.

The argument of the gentleman from New Jersey that we met on the first Monday of December with two sanctions—that is, with the sanction of the Constitution and the sanction of the resolution of adjournment on the preceding Saturday—seems to me, with all respect to him, and he is a distinguished lawyer, to be of very little weight. How could a mere concurrent resolution, if one were passed, effect in any way whatever this absolute command of the Constitution of the United States? Does anybody pretend to say that a mere concurrent resolution of Congress adds sanction to a mandate of the Constitution? Not at all. It might just as well not have been passed; nor should it weigh an iota in determining the duty of Congress. We met on the first Monday of last December in obedience to a requirement of the Constitution of the United States, not in obedience to a resolution of adjournment.

It is said that there has never been a precedent against the contention of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], and that early Congresses went directly from a special session into a regular session and treated it as one session.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Just one moment. But later he did cite a precedent in which Senator George F. Edmunds, one of the greatest of our constitutional lawyers, introduced in the Senate a resolution declaring that a special session ended by operation of law when the regular session began. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] acknowledged that that resolution, which, he said, was purely academic, inasmuch as it was passed without any discussion, was directly opposed to his contention. He therefore thought it of little importance. But the fact that Senator Edmunds introduced that resolution and that it received the unanimous vote of the Senate are facts entitled to great weight in this discussion.

But, Mr. Chairman, if it were true that there is no precedent contrary to the gentleman's contention, that, in and of itself, would not be conclusive. Congress had uniformly held that a quorum, as defined by the Constitution, meant a voting quorum and not a present quorum in this House. For generations Congress had clung to that absurd doctrine. Suddenly, in the twinkling of an eye, it was overthrown in this Chamber, and this destruction of that time-honored precedent has been given the sanction of law by the Supreme Court of the United States. A bad precedent does not make good law.

There is a constitutional provision for an extraordinary, as there is also one for a regular session of Congress. If there were no constitutional provision for a regular session, we should be at the mercy of the President of the United States, as the people of England were at the mercy of the Stuarts when they refused to assemble the British Parliament. And I am unwilling to believe that the great statesmen in that Convention, presided over by the grandest of all men, George Washington, forgot so vitally important a duty as the appointing of a date for the regular meeting of Congress.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question? The gentleman has, I think, very clearly demonstrated that a regular session of Congress convenes on the first Monday of each December by operation of law. I should like to ask if it does not follow necessarily and logically that if a regular session convenes by operation of law, defined in the Constitution, at a particular time, that any other session in force theretofore must conclude by operation of law at the same instant?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not think that there can be any question about it. The answer, in my judgment, is yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, but the Chair will hear the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not rise, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of continuing the discussion, but I will say just a word with reference to the suggestion made by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER], who relies, with a great deal of force and ingenuity of argument, upon the analogy between a session of court and a session of Congress. I would concede that if the analogy is sound, his argument is entitled to great weight and might, perhaps, be conclusive; but I wish to submit that the analogy fails, because to a session of court, among other things, process is returnable; motions are to be made within a certain time and pleas in abatement are to be filed. The court has no power to change the day fixed for its meeting. None of these things are true of Congress. No process is returnable to a session of Congress. Nothing is to be done by virtue of the law or the Constitution on the specific day of meeting, or within a particular time from that day; therefore the elements involved in a session of court are entirely absent in connection with a session of Congress, and the analogy is not complete.

I wish to say just a word with reference to the suggestion very pertinently and forcefully made last evening by the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCDERMOTT], and that is with reference to the question as to whether the clause providing that the President may adjourn Congress from time to time is limited in its operations to a special or extraordinary or Presidential session, so called. If so limited, beyond any question it would create a constitutional distinction between the two sessions, which undoubtedly would settle the question pending.

Since the adjournment last evening I have taken occasion to examine Madison's Journal of the Constitutional Convention, and the Federalist, upon that precise point, for the purpose of ascertaining what light, if any, might be derived from that source, and I should be glad to give the committee the benefit of the investigation.

I find in the report of the committee on detail, made on August 6, 1787, that the clause in question appears in Article X, section 2, which reads as follows:

SEC. 2. He shall from time to time give information to the Legislature of the state of the Union. He may recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. He may convene them on extraordinary occasions. In case of disagreement between the two Houses with regard to the time of adjournment he may adjourn them to such time as he thinks proper. He shall take care that the laws of the United States be duly and faithfully executed. He shall commission all the officers of the United States, and shall appoint officers in all cases not otherwise provided for by this Constitution. He shall receive ambassadors, and may correspond with the supreme executives of the several States. He shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons, but his pardons shall not be pleadable in bar of an impeachment. He shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States.

He shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during his continuance in office. Before he shall enter on the duties of his Department he shall take the following oath of affirmation: "I, ——, solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States of America." He shall be removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Representatives, and conviction in the Supreme Court of treason, bribery, or corruption. In case of his removal, as aforesaid, death, resignation, or disability to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the President of the Senate shall exercise those powers and duties until another President of the United States be chosen, or until the disability of the President be removed. (Journal of Constitutional Convention (Madison). Scott, Foresman & Co. Ed., vol. ii, p. 457.)

This is the first time the clause appears in the proceedings of the Convention. It appears in a section defining the powers and duties of the President with the clause authorizing the convening of Congress in an extraordinary session, where they would naturally be expected to appear. It will be observed that the two propositions are found in separate and distinct sentences. One sentence reads:

He may convene them on extraordinary occasions.

And the other—

In case of disagreement between the two Houses with regard to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he thinks proper.

In this section the argument of juxtaposition as a reason why the clause in question is a limitation upon the so-called "Presidential session" clearly fails.

In the report of the committee on style, which had no power to change any substantive provision of the Constitution and only had the power to perfect the language and arrangement, made on September 12, 1787, these two independent sentences are grouped together, making two clauses of one sentence in Article II, section 3 (ibid., 709), reading as follows:

He may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper, etc.—

transposing the first sentence and slightly varying the second. Article X, section 2, down to and including the clause "He shall commission all officers of the United States," in the report of the committee on detail, appears in the report of the committee on style, in Article II, as section 3. The substance of the remainder of section 2, considerably transposed and with considerable change of verbiage, is found in sections 1 and 2 of Article II, in the report of the committee on style.

Under these conditions the argument of juxtaposition seems entitled to but little weight. There is nothing said, so far as I can find in the debates in the Convention, upon the construction of this clause—simply the report of the committee on detail, and later on the report of the committee on style.

In the Federalist, in No. 68, written by Mr. Alexander Hamilton, who was also a member of the committee on style, reporting the Constitution in the language in which it now stands, this clause is referred to and construed. This is the great paper in which Mr. Hamilton is defining the powers and the limitations upon the power of the President of the United States, and with reference to this specific point he says:

Fourthly. The President can only adjourn the National Legislature in the single case of disagreement about the time of the adjournment.

I ask the Chair to note this. If this clause is limited to a special session, it is a very important and significant limitation. Mr. Hamilton is undertaking to define in this paper the limitations upon the Presidential power, and he fails to cite this important and significant limitation. Therefore it is a fair inference that in his judgment—he having made the report or taken a part in the report of the committee on style, and being responsible for the language as it now stands—it was not limited in its operation to a special session, but applied generally. His first illustration of an analogous power is that "The British monarch may prorogue or even dissolve Parliament." This illustration, of course, can not be confined to special sessions, but applies to all sessions. Further, by way of illustration, he says:

The governor of New York may also prorogue the legislature of this State for a limited time; a power which, in certain situations, may be employed to very important purposes—

Applicable, apparently, to every session.

Of course it is not conclusive, but it is significant, and if the Chair please, I point to the fact that while Hamilton elaborates the proposition, he, in no sense intimates that it is confined in its application to a special session of Congress. If it is true that this clause is confined to special sessions, it is a most important limitation, and should have been emphasized rather than omitted by Hamilton. To hold that Hamilton omitted it is to impeach either his intelligence or candor, neither of which can be done successfully.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MCDERMOTT. Mr. Chairman, the Madison Papers, as I recollect them, are correctly stated by the gentleman from Maine. In the first draft of the Constitution the power, similar to the power of the King to prorogue Parliament, was indicated in a separate sentence. When the Constitution was adopted, the conjunction was inserted, "He might convene them on extraordinary occasions and." Now, the introduction of the conjunction, in my judgment, shows the relation between the power of proroguing and the convening of the extraordinary session.

You must also read it, it seems to me, in view of the entire text of the Constitution. It is impossible to believe that a Constitution providing that neither House can adjourn without the consent of the other for more than three days, and that provides that there shall be a division of the Government of the United States into executive, judicial, and legislative departments, and that the power of neither shall be exercised by any other, intended to convey to the President of the United States, or vest in him rather, the power given by the unwritten constitution of England to the King of Great Britain to prorogue Parliament.

That power had been exercised by the King of England to the point of revolution. The exercise of it was one of the causes of complaint that led to the Cromwellian era. Our forefathers were well acquainted with it, and they were in a remedial frame of mind, and when they inserted that conjunction they intended to limit the power of the President as to the practical dissolution, as proroguing is and always was when exercised by the King of England, in a case where he as President called them to carry out his views on legislation, demanding an extraordinary session. I do not know that it is at all important as affecting this bill, but I look at it as raising the question whether a President in partisan affiliation and sympathy with one House of a divided Congress—divided in a partisan aspect—may prorogue Congress if they disagree.

Hence we come to the fact that there is one joint resolution, and only one, that the President of the United States can not pass upon. Every law and every joint resolution must be certified to the President and receive his action, or in case of nonaction become effective as the voice of Congress independent of his view, with one exception. We preserve the right to Congress to adjourn. The joint resolution of the House and Senate to adjourn is the only resolution that the President of the United States is not called to pass upon when passed by Congress. It seems to me, therefore, that the framers of the Constitution did not intend that the President and one House of Congress acting in sympathy could prorogue Congress as the King had been accustomed, in fear or otherwise, to prorogue Parliament. However, as to the relation of this question to this bill, I am not entirely clear that it is governing. It is an interesting point, and I shall ask the leave of the House to continue the discussion of the question in print.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, one suggestion only. I simply wish to say this——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the committee that the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would, perhaps, like to make this additional suggestion.

Mr. McDERMOTT. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine to one thing—that occasion has arisen under this section where the President may act. The Senate adjourned without day. The Senate adjourned by the declaration of its presiding officer sine die. This House has never adjourned sine die, therefore the Senate is not in session under the extraordinary call, while, if the view of the gentleman from Maine as to the continuous session is correct, we are in session under that call, and therefore a disagreement has arisen between the House and the Senate, and the duty or power of the President to act is conferred by the Senate, and he could invoke it and prorogue us to meet some other time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not concede the gentleman's premises. I never will concede, neither do I think any court would hold, that the President of the Senate, on his own motion without a preliminary motion adopted by the Senate, could adjourn even that body without day. He has not that power, in my judgment.

Mr. McDERMOTT. I think the rule, Mr. Chairman, of parliamentary law is this: That when there is not dissent by a body the body assents, and that where the president or presiding officer of a body declares the body adjourned, and there is no objection, his ruling is assent by the body, and all preliminary matters of form are immaterial. If the president declares that body adjourned and there is not objection on the part of anybody and——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The body is not in a position to object after the drop of the gavel.

Nobody could then raise an objection as far as that is concerned. If the gentleman from New Jersey thinks that a presiding officer of a body, on his own motion, can terminate the existence of a body by declaring it adjourned sine die——

Mr. McDERMOTT. Not at all, they may proceed to displace him and elect another officer, but if they consent to it, it is the decision not only of the Chair, but of the body, and a consent to adjourn sine die. Therefore there is a practical disagreement between the two Houses.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; I do not think that amounts to a disagreement. A disagreement between the two Houses results from the action of one body sending that action down to another. Here they have had no chance to disagree.

Mr. McDERMOTT. They have had the chance by continuing in session.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It has never reached us as a legislative proposition. A disagreement between the two Houses results from something we have had the opportunity to concur with or disagree to, and this proposition has never been sent down to us.

Mr. McDERMOTT. It arises from the fact that the Senate adjourned sine die. There was no necessity to send it down to us if they did actually adjourn.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But the gentleman begs the question or assumes it.

Mr. McDERMOTT. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine to this fact, that there is no regular way provided in the Constitution by which the President of the United States can obtain cognizance that there is a disagreement between the Senate and the House on account of adjournment. It is a peculiar resolution, in no wise to be certified to him, and the only concurrent resolution that is not certified to him.

Now, it does seem to me that where he calls a session he may suggest the adjournment, as the King used to, and if then there is a disagreement, he may prorogue it. I think the old practice was in the minds of those who framed the Constitution. I think he may suggest the adjournment, and if the House disagrees with the Senate in following his suggestion, he may prorogue them. I know of no way in which the President of the United States can get official knowledge of the fact that there is a disagreement between the House and the Senate as to the time of adjournment, nor do I know of any way in which at a regular session any such disagreement can ever arise.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The suggestions of the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey are involved in the concrete proposition as to whether or not this clause to which he refers is specifically applicable and confined to a special session. I will not follow him in that discussion because, in my judgment, it is hardly worth while. I also fully appreciate the distinguished gentleman's position when he says that the report of the committee on detail left this proposition with reference to the power of the President to adjourn from time to time applicable to both sessions, but that the report of the committee on style changed it and confined the operation of that clause to the special session.

I call his attention to this fact, that, as we all know and everybody concedes, the committee on style had no power to change the substance of the Constitution; it was simply their purpose and duty to report it in better and more concrete shape, and if they produced that pronounced change, they transcended their power. That must be the obvious conclusion. Without any debate or discussion, it is a violent inference that they did so transcend it. I proceed upon the basis that the final draft of the Constitution is in entire harmony with the report of the committee on detail and was correctly construed by Hamilton, March 14, 1788, when he wrote the great paper above referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

The question raised by the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] does not involve the question of whether or not Senators, Representatives, and Delegates attending Congress at this time should or should not receive mileage. That is a question for the Committee of the Whole to decide, and not the Chair. The question presented to the Chair is the parliamentary question of whether or not there is any existing law authorizing the payment of the mileage for which it is proposed to appropriate the amount stated in this bill.

The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill passed at the last session of the Fifty-seventh Congress appropriated for the payment of mileage to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates attending the first annual session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. This appropriation, however, was not available until the day appointed by the Constitution for the assembling of this Congress at its first annual session.

The Fifty-eighth Congress was convened by proclamation of the President of the United States November 9, 1903. Soon thereafter it passed the following resolution:

Resolved, etc., That the appropriations for mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1904, approved February 25, 1903, be, and the same are hereby, made immediately available and authorized to be paid to Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories for attendance on the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

By this resolution the money appropriated for the payment of mileage at the session of this Congress beginning on the first Monday of December last was paid to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates attending the session of this Congress convened by the President. By the wording of this resolution Congress declared that the session convened by the President was the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. It is now declared by the paragraph in this urgency deficiency appropriation bill that this is the second session of this Congress, and it is proposed to appropriate money for the payment of mileage to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates attending upon this second session.

The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order against this paragraph, claiming there is no existing law authorizing the appropriation, and that therefore the paragraph is not in order under section 2 of Rule XXI, which is as follows:

2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The Chair has spent some time in endeavoring to ascertain what, if any, law there is governing the payment of mileage. As a result of this investigation it has been ascertained that under various statutes Senators, Representatives, and Delegates attending the sessions of Congress have received mileage whether the session was convened by the President or assembled at the time fixed by the Constitution or by statute, the only exception being in the Fortieth Congress. When the act fixing the 4th of March for the assembling of Congress, in addition to the times fixed by the Constitution, was passed, by that act it was provided that Members and Senators of the previous Congress should not receive mileage for attendance upon the session beginning March 4, and for the information of the committee, and with its permission, the Chair will print, in connection with this ruling, these several statutes.

The act of 1874, repealing the increase of salaries of Members of Congress to $7,500 a year, revived the act of 1866, since which time there has been no legislation upon this subject. Therefore the act of 1866 is the law in force to-day in respect to the compensation to be paid to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, and also the law now in force governing the question of mileage. This law reads as follows:

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $5,000 per annum, to be computed from the first day of the present Congress, and in addition thereto mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session.

It will be observed that the language of this act in respect to mileage is significant, and from it there can be but one conclusion, and that is that the mileage authorized to be paid is intended as additional compensation without any particular reference to the expense incurred in traveling to and from the sessions of Congress, just as the law allows a certain per diem in addition to the salary paid to the officers and agents of the Government who are obliged to travel on the business of the Government or in the discharge of their duties. The language which follows is merely descriptive of how the mileage authorized to be paid is to be estimated. The law says it is "to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session." In the opinion of the Chair the words "regular session" do not mean alone the sessions of Congress convened under authority of the Constitution, but rather that this mileage is to be paid at any session of Congress lawfully convened, and the amount is to be estimated as stated in the act—that is, on the same basis that mileage is paid to Senators and Representatives when attending the regular or annual sessions provided for by the Constitution.

Of course no one contends that under this law Senators and Representatives and Delegates are entitled to more than one payment as mileage for attending one session of Congress. The question, therefore, of whether this paragraph is in order or whether there is any existing law authorizing the appropriation of this money turns upon the proposition of whether Congress is now in the session convened by the President of the United States or whether that session expired by operation of law and Congress is now in session under and by virtue of that provision of the Constitution which designates the first Monday in December as the day when it shall assemble in annual session.

When this Congress convened on November 9 the business of the Congress proceeded as usual, and it was in session on Saturday, December 5, 1903, the last secular day before the first Monday in December. In the House of Representatives, at the close of that day, as appears from the RECORD, the simple motion to adjourn was agreed to, and the Speaker announced, "The House stands adjourned," without adding, as usual, the day to which the "House stands adjourned." No resolution to terminate the session was proposed. In the Senate on the same day it was voted to take a recess until 11.50 a. m., Monday, December 7. On that day and hour the Senate met, and after the transaction of the usual business and the adoption of the usual vote of thanks to the presiding officer, the hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the President pro tempore said:

Senators, the hour provided by law for the meeting of the first regular session of the Fifty-eighth Congress having arrived, I declare the extraordinary session adjourned without day.

Immediately thereafter the President pro tempore called the session to order for the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

In the House at the same hour the Speaker called the House to order and, after prayer by the Chaplain, directed that the roll be called by States to ascertain the presence of a quorum, and business proceeded as at the beginning of a session. The usual resolution was passed, notifying the President of the United States that the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress was assembled and that a quorum of the two Houses was present and ready to receive any message which he might deem proper to submit.

This is a complete statement, as shown by the RECORD, of what took place in the two Houses of Congress on December 5 and December 7.

On the following day the Journal of the House records the fact that on Monday, December 7, the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress assembled. The language of the Journal is as follows:

JOURNAL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Begun and held at the Capitol, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on Monday, the 7th day of December, in the year of Our Lord 1903, being the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, held under the Constitution of the Government of the United States, and in the one hundred and twenty-eighth year of the independence of said States.

MONDAY, December 7, 1903.

On which day, being the day fixed by the Constitution of the United States for the meeting of Congress, JOSEPH G. CANNON, the Speaker (a Representative from the State of Illinois), and the following Members of the House of Representatives answered to their names.

This Journal declaring this to be the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress was unanimously approved by the House. The Journal of the Senate reciting the same facts was likewise approved.

In the opinion of the Chair the question of whether this is a continuation of the session of Congress convened by the President or the second session convened under and by virtue of the provision of the Constitution fixing the time for the assembling of Congress is a mixed question of law and fact, and the Chair, as the presiding officer of this committee appointed by the Speaker of the House, in deciding this question is bound to take cognizance of what the House itself has done in determining whether or not this is or is not the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

As a matter of law, the Chair is clearly of the opinion that the session of this Congress convened by the President of the United States terminated when the moment of time arrived for the Congress to convene in its regular annual session under the Constitution. That session of Congress there terminated by operation of law, not because there is any law fixing the limit of time that a session of Congress convened by the President should remain in session, but because of the constitutional provision fixing the time when the first regular annual session of this Congress should convene. The contention that because Congress was in session on the last secular day preceding the first Monday in December, and that there was no formal termination of this session at that time, and that therefore this is a continuation of that session, seems to the Chair untenable. It would, in the opinion of the Chair, be as reasonable to say that because there will be no formal ending of to-day and no formal beginning of to-morrow therefore Saturday will continue forever or throughout our existence. [Applause.]

The illustration used by the gentleman from Maine to prove his contention that this is a continuous session—namely, that if the House was in the act of calling the roll upon the passage of some bill when the hour arrived for the convening of Congress in its annual or constitutional session that the roll call could not be further proceeded with—does not prove anything. As a matter of fact, and as the records of Congress show, that incident or circumstance has occurred on several occasions when the time for the termination by operation of law of the second annual session of Congress arrived. The opinion of the Chair that the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress convened by the President terminated by operation of that provision of the Constitution which fixes the time for the beginning of the annual session of this Congress is not without precedent.

In the Fortieth Congress this same question arose. Just at the close of the extra session, Mr. Sherman, then a Senator from Ohio, said:

I can not see any object in passing this concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution he referred to was that the presiding officers of the two Houses should at a specified time declare their respective Houses adjourned without day.

Said Mr. Sherman:

The Constitution provides that the regular session of Congress shall be on the first Monday of December, and, according to law, I believe—or, at any rate, such is the usage—the hour for meeting on that day is 12 o'clock. We shall meet at that time in a new session. The recent law has not changed that regular time of meeting, and the result is that the next session of Congress will commence necessarily at noon on Monday.

Mr. Sumner, on the same occasion, said:

And that brings me to the exact point as to whether the present session should expire precisely at the time when the coming session begins. I see no reason why it should not. I see no reason why we should interpose the buffer even for five minutes.

It was proposed to adjourn to 11 o'clock and 55 minutes.

Let one session come right up close upon the other, and then we shall exclude every possibility of evil consequences from the character of the Chief Magistrate. * * * Now, I know not why when this session expires we may not at the same time announce the beginning of the new session.

These quotations, taken from the Globe, show that in the judgment of such men as Mr. Sherman and Mr. Sumner, two of the ablest men in either House of Congress at that time, if not since, the called session of the Fortieth Congress expired by operation of law when the time for the Congress to assemble under the Constitution arrived.

The proceedings of the Forty-fifth Congress have been referred to, and the Chair desires to present to the committee in support of its ruling the history of the matter from the precedents prepared by Mr. Asher C. Hinds, clerk at the Speaker's table.

On October 15, 1877, Congress met in extraordinary session on the call of the President and remained in session until the first Monday in December, the day appointed by the Constitution for the regular assembling of Congress.

On Saturday, December 1, 1877, Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to adjourn their respective Houses, without day, at 3 o'clock p. m. this day.

Later on the day of December 1 the House took a recess until 10 a. m. of the calendar day of Monday, December 3, the day prescribed by the Constitution for the meeting of the regular session of Congress.

On the same day, December 1, the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 3, at 10 a. m.

As soon as the Senate had approved its Journal on Monday, December 3, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, offered this resolution, which was agreed to without debate:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the judgment of the two Houses that the present session of Congress expires by operation of law at 12 o'clock meridian this day.

On the same day this resolution was agreed to by the House without debate.

After the above resolution had been agreed to the Senate took up the resolution of the House of December 1, and agreed to it with an amendment striking out the words "3 o'clock p. m. this day" and inserting "11 o'clock and 50 minutes a. m. Monday, the 3d of December, instant." The House concurred in that amendment.

Then the two Houses agreed to the usual resolutions authorizing the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President and inform him of the adjournment.

And at 11.50 a. m. the Speaker declared the House adjourned sine die in accordance with the resolution of the two Houses; and ten minutes later the Speaker, at 12 m., called the House together in the new session, the roll being called by States.

Some gentlemen have said that the value of this precedent is practically destroyed because the resolution declaring it to be the judgment of both Houses of Congress that the extra session expired by operation of law was agreed to without debate. The RECORD shows that there was considerable discussion over this proposition. There was some trouble or fear of trouble in the matter of securing a sine die adjournment, and at the last moment, in order that the question might be settled, Senator Edmunds offered the concurrent resolution expressing the judgment of the two Houses upon this question.

In the judgment of the Chair, therefore, the session of Congress convened by the President on November 9, 1903, terminated by operation of law; that this is a session of Congress separate and distinct from that one, and, as declared by the unanimously approved Journals of the House and Senate, is the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. It being the regular annual session, and as the law of 1866 authorizes the payment of mileage to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates attending this session, in the opinion of the Chair the paragraph appropriating the money for the payment of that mileage is clearly in order.

The Chair therefore overrules the point of order. [Applause.]

The Chair inserts as an appendix to this decision the following:

The statutes heretofore enacted for compensation and mileage for Members of Congress.

CHAPTER XVII.—An act for allowing compensation to the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to the officers of both Houses. (c)

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, etc., That at every session of Congress, and at every meeting of the Senate in the recess of Congress, prior to the 4th day of March, in the year 1795, each Senator shall be entitled to receive $6 for every day he shall attend the Senate, and shall also be allowed, at the commencement and end of every such session and meeting, $6 for every 20 miles of the estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress; and in case any Member of the Senate shall be detained by sickness on his journey to or from any such session or meeting, or after his arrival shall be unable to attend the Senate, he shall be entitled to the same daily allowance: Provided always, That no Senator shall be allowed a sum exceeding the rate of $6 a day from the end of one such session or meeting to the time of his taking his seat in another. (1st Cong., 1st sess., U. S. Stat. L., vol. 1, p. 70 (1789).)

Approved September 22, 1789.

CHAPTER XIII.—An act for allowing full mileage to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That at the present extraordinary meeting and session of Congress the respective members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives shall be entitled to receive a full allowance of mileage, any law to the contrary notwithstanding. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 1, p. 533, 5th Cong., 1st sess.)

Approved July 6, 1797.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That at every session of Congress after the said 3d day of March, 1817, each Representative and Delegate shall be entitled to receive $8 for every day he has attended or shall attend the House of Representatives, and shall also be allowed $8 for every 20 miles of the estimated distance by the most usual road from his place of residence to the seat of Congress at the commencement and end of every such session and meeting; and that all sums for travel already performed to be due and payable at the time of passing this act. And in case any Representative or Delegate has been, is, or shall be detained by sickness on his journey to or from the session of Congress, or, after his arrival, has been, is, or shall be unable to attend the House of Representatives, he shall be entitled to the same daily allowance. And the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be entitled to receive, in addition to his compensation as a Representative, $8 for every day he has attended or shall attend the House: Provided always, That no Representative or Delegate shall be allowed a sum exceeding the rate of $8 a day from the end of one session to the time of his taking his seat in another. (15th Cong., 1st sess., U. S. Stat. L., vol. 3, p. 404, chap. 5. An act allowing compensation to the members of the Senate, Members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the Delegates of the Territories, and repealing all other laws on that subject.)

Approved January 22, 1818.

CHAPTER CVIII.—An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853, and for other purposes.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act allowing compensation to the members of the Senate, Members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the Delegates from the Territories,' and repealing all other laws on that subject," shall apply to Senators and Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from the Territories, at all extra sessions of Congress or of the Senate convened within ten days after the adjournment of a regular session. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 10, p. 98, 32d Cong., 1st sess.)

CHAPTER CXXIII.—An act to regulate the compensation of Members of Congress.

Be it enacted, etc., That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $6,000 for each Congress, and mileage as now provided by law for two sessions only, to be paid in manner following, to wit: On the first day of each regular session each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall receive his mileage for one session, and on the first day of each month thereafter during such session compensation at the rate of $3,000 per annum during the continuance of such session, and at the end of such session he shall receive the residue of his salary due to him at such time at the rate aforesaid still unpaid; and at the beginning of the second regular session of the Congress each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall receive his mileage for such second session and monthly during such session compensation at the rate of $3,000 per annum till the 4th day of March terminating the Congress, and on that day each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall be entitled to receive any balance of the $6,000 not theretofore paid in the said monthly installments as above directed. (U. S. Stat. L., p. 48, vol. 11.)

Joint resolution to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of Members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856.

Resolved, etc., That the compensation allowed to Members of Congress by an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of Members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856, be paid in the following manner, to wit: On the first day of the first session of each Congress, or as soon thereafter as he may be in attendance and apply, each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall receive his mileage, as now provided by law, and all his compensation from the beginning of his term, to be computed at the rate of $250 per month, and during the session compensation at the same rate. And on the first day of the second or any subsequent session he shall receive his mileage as now allowed by law, and all compensation which has accrued during the adjournment at the rate aforesaid, and during said session compensation at the same rate.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That so much of said act approved August 16, 1856, as conflicts with this joint resolution and postpones the payment of said compensation until the close of each session be, and the same is hereby, repealed. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 11, p. 367, 35th Cong., 1st sess.)

Approved December 23, 1857.

Joint resolution amendatory of an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of Members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856, so far as relates to such Members as shall die during their terms of service.

Be it resolved, etc., That whenever hereafter any person elected a Member of the Senate or House of Representatives shall die after the commencement of the Congress to which he shall have been so elected compensation shall be computed and paid to his widow, or if no widow survive him, to his heirs at law, for the period that shall have elapsed from the commencement of such Congress as aforesaid to the time of his death, at the rate of $3,000 per annum: Provided, however, That compensation shall be computed and paid in all cases for a period of not less than three months: And provided further, That in no case shall constructive mileage be computed or paid.

SEC. 2. Be it further resolved, That the compensation of each person elected or appointed afterwards to supply the vacancy so occasioned shall hereafter be computed and paid from the time the compensation of his predecessor is hereby directed to be computed and paid for, and not otherwise.

SEC. 3. Be it further resolved, That the provisions of this joint resolution, so far as the same are beneficial to the widows or heirs at law of Members of Congress, as aforesaid, shall be extended and applied to the widows and heirs at law of Members elected to the present Congress who have died since its commencement. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 11, p. 443, 35th Cong., 2d sess.)

Approved, March 3, 1859.

CHAPTER XLI.—An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1863, and additional appropriations for the year ending 30th of June, 1862.

Legislative.—For compensation and mileage of Senators, $240,450: Provided, That the second mileage due by law shall be paid at the present session as soon as certified by the presiding officers of the Senate and House: And provided further, That the foregoing proviso shall not be construed to include more than two mileages for the present Congress. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 12, p. 355, 37th Cong., 2d sess.)

Approved, March 14, 1862.

CHAPTER LXXIII.—An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866, and additional appropriations for the current fiscal year.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That no part of the money appropriated either by this act or former acts shall be applied to the payment of any claim for constructive mileage on account of any extra session of either House of Congress. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 13, p. 460, 38th Cong., 2d sess.)

Approved, March 2, 1865.

CHAPTER CCXCVI.—An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $5,000 per annum, to be computed from the first day of the present Congress, and in addition thereto mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session; but nothing herein contained shall affect mileage account already accrued under existing laws: Provided, That hereafter mileage accounts of Senators shall be certified by the President of the Senate and those of Representatives and Delegates by the Speaker of the House of Representatives: And provided further, That the pay of the Speaker shall be $8,000 per annum. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 14, p. 323, 39th Cong., 1st sess.)

CHAPTER X.—An act to fix the times for the regular meetings of Congress.

Be it enacted, etc., That, in addition to the present regular times of meeting of Congress, there shall be a meeting of the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and of each succeeding Congress thereafter, at 12 o'clock meridian on the 4th day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected, except that when the 4th of March occurs on Sunday then the meeting shall take place at the same hour on the next succeeding day.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person who was a Member of the previous Congress shall receive any compensation as mileage for going to or returning from the additional session provided for by the foregoing section. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 14, p. 378, 39th Cong., 2d. sess.)
Approved, January 22, 1867.

CHAPTER XI.—An act repealing the increase of salaries of Members of Congress and other officers.

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled, "An act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the compensation of public officers and employees, whether Members of Congress, Delegates, or others, except the President of the United States and the Justices of the Supreme Court, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the salaries, compensation, and allowances of all said persons, except as aforesaid, shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act: Provided, That mileage shall not be allowed for the first session of the Forty-third Congress; that all moneys appropriated as compensation to the Members of the Forty-second Congress in excess of the mileage and allowances fixed by law at the commencement of said Congress, respectively, or which, having been drawn, have been returned in any form to the United States, are hereby covered into the Treasury of the United States, and are declared to be the moneys of the United States absolutely, the same as if they had never been appropriated as aforesaid. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 18, pt. 3, p. 4; 43d Cong., 1st sess.)
Approved, January 20, 1874.

CHAPTER III.—An act to provide for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Senate.—For the payment of mileage, for actual travel only, to Senators who took their seats at the session of the Senate convened on the 5th day of March, 1877, by proclamation of the President, and who were not members of the previous Congress, $6,500. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 20, p. 10, 45th Cong., 2d sess.)
Approved, December 15, 1877.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I now renew my motion to strike out the paragraph in reference to mileage.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the paragraph as follows.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his motion to amend.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded the floor. The Chair recognized me for a motion. I desire to discuss my motion before the gentleman from Ohio is recognized. Am I correct in my position?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama would have to be held in abeyance until the paragraph has been perfected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, but, Mr. Chairman, I had the floor and was recognized. Of course I admit that the vote will not be taken on the paragraph until the House has concluded whether it will amend it or not, but the Chair has recognized me and I am entitled to the floor until I yield it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, to cut the matter short, if the Chair will recognize me to make my motion to amend after the five minutes of the gentleman from Alabama have expired, I will waive any question about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well; the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio after the gentleman from Alabama has completed his remarks.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest that the gentleman make his motion as to both paragraphs, covering the mileage of the Senate and House. He said he moved to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, as I understood the parliamentary situation on yesterday, the chairman of the committee, by unanimous consent, amended the paragraph by inserting the mileage for the Senate.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There are two paragraphs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I make my motion. I move to strike out the two paragraphs relating to mileage, one for the House and one for the Senate. When the question comes to a vote I will ask the Chair to submit the proposition, if necessary, that we vote on both together, so that we may obviate two votes on the proposition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order against the gentleman's motion, so far as it relates to the paragraph in reference to the mileage of the Senate. That was put in by a vote of the committee and we can not move to strike that out.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no; it went in by unanimous consent, with the understanding that it would be open to the same consideration as the other.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not understand that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, some time ago when this bill was reported to the House, having been opposed to the paragraph in the committee, I felt it was my duty to present the reasons to the House why I opposed the adoption of this paragraph, why I was opposed to this House paying itself a second mileage for this session of Congress. I believed then, and I believe now, that we have been legally and technically in one session of Congress from the time when we met up to the present day. But I have already stated my opinion upon that question, and I do not care to burden the House with renewed discussion along that line. But whether we have been in two technical sessions or one technical session since the 9th day of November down to the present day, I say that under no contemplation of law as recognized by ourselves and our constituents when we were elected to this Congress are we justified in accepting a second mileage or paying ourselves a second mileage when in fact we have been in continuous session since the 9th day of last November. I do not mean to say that the House has not taken a recess occasionally from day to day. I do not intend to deny the fact that on Sundays we have not been in session, but in practice and in fact we have been in continuous session. On Saturday before the first Monday in December we took a recess until 11 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m. of that Monday, carrying the session of the Saturday previous over until a few minutes before 12 o'clock noon on that day.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman, although I have very little time.

Mr. THAYER. If I understand the gentleman's position, he is opposed to receiving this mileage because we have had one continuous session. Now, if we had had a sine die adjournment on Saturday, December 5, instead of an ordinary adjournment, then does he say we would be entitled to our mileage?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can say right here that I would not accept my mileage under those circumstances. I grant that any gentleman can accept them or not, as he sees proper.

Mr. THAYER. I have not asked that question. Will you answer the question I did ask?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is an answer to your question as I understand it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman consider mileage is to cover actual expenses of traveling to Washington and returning, or does he consider it as a part of the compensation of the Members of the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I consider it, Mr. Chairman, unquestionably a part of the compensation, and that is just exactly what I have been attempting to say. I say that it is a part of the compensation; that when we were elected we were elected with that compensation, and there is nothing that has arisen since that time that would in fact, in law, or in equity entitle us to increase our compensation any more than there would be if we brought in a bill making our salaries $10,000 a year instead of $5,000 a year.

Now, to sum up the proposition. You may argue that we ought to have a salary of $10,000. You may argue that a Member of Congress ought to have a compensation of $10,000 a year. But if we are going to increase our salaries, let us walk out flat-footed and tell the country exactly what we are going to do and why we are going to do it. But if it is compensation, can any gentleman give a good and satisfactory reason why the compensation should be increased because on Monday, five minutes before noon, we adjourned for that day and met five minutes afterwards? Is that any better reason why we should have more pay than if we had gone on in continuous session? Is there any reason why we should have more pay as Members if we had adjourned in the month of November and then met in December, and adjourned a month later, when, practically, we accomplished the ordinary amount of work on the day that we adjourned?

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman think that mileage accepted for any extra session would not be an increase of his salary?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it had gone through, it would be an increase of compensation. If we had been put to additional trouble or labor or expense, there would be some good, valid reason why a Member's compensation should be increased; but when I say that we were here on Saturday and adjourned over to Monday, were in session at 11.55 o'clock in what they call an "extra session" and met again in a few minutes, I want to know where is the reason that justifies us in increasing our compensation or justifies us in taking it?

Mr. SIMS. Now, then, in the Fifty-fifth Congress we had an extra session on the 15th day of March, eleven days after the Fifty-fourth Congress adjourned, and many Members did not go home in the brief interval between the Fifty-fourth Congress and the Fifty-fifth, and yet we passed a resolution giving them mileage, and, as far as I recollect, the gentleman assented to it. Now, if we gave that mileage, is it not an addition to the compensation not contemplated by the law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know whether it is contemplated by the law, but it was expended, and, of course, increased the compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But Congress adjourned, and we went home. Of course some of the men did not go home, but Congress went home, as far as that was concerned, and I believe most of the Members of the House did.

Mr. SIMS. I am opposed to paying this, but not on the question of compensation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to add that the Committee on Appropriations reported this item to the House because it seemed to them to be in the line of precedents, as stated by the chairman of the committee, and in order that the House might have the opportunity to give it consideration, the subject having been officially brought to the attention of the committee by the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S., OFFICE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1904.

Hon. J. A. HEMENWAY,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: By joint resolution approved November 12, 1903, the appropriation made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved February 25, 1903, for mileage of Representatives and Delegates in Congress for the present session was made available and payable and has been paid for attendance on the extraordinary session of the present Congress, which assembled November 9, 1903.

I am daily in receipt of applications from a large number of Members of the House for their mileage for the present session, under authority of the law, which provides that they are entitled to mileage for each regular session of Congress. In order to comply with the request and pay mileage under said law to all Members and Delegates for the present session it will be necessary to provide an appropriation in the deficiency bill or otherwise in the sum of $145,000.

Very respectfully,
HENRY CASSON,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will read.

In line 5, page 58, after the word "dollars," add the following:
"Provided, That any Member of Congress who shall be entitled to the mileage appropriated in this bill may, if he so desires, cover the same into the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall give such Member a receipt for the same and carry it upon the books of the Treasury as a miscellaneous item: And provided further, That any money remaining to the credit of any Member of Congress, as the whole or any part of his mileage, for the period of thirty days, after the approval of the act, shall lapse into the Treasury and be taken up as a like item of money in the Treasury."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is the point of order?

Mr. HAY. That it changes existing law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is simply a limitation upon the paragraph.

Mr. HAY. It is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Virginia if he has anything to say in support of his point of order.

Mr. HAY. It is already the law that all such sums shall lapse into the Treasury after the 1st day of July, and this is new legislation on an appropriation bill and practically repeals that law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I think it is not necessary to argue that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the general rule of parliamentary law that it is seldom possible, if ever, to change existing law under a term or form of a limitation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; but here we propose to make an appropriation of $145,000, and this amendment simply proposes that when so made the conditions upon which it is made shall adhere to the document itself. It does not change existing law, it simply limits the appropriation of this money to the time and the specific purpose for which it is offered.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest to the Chair that it in no way changes the appropriation, it simply limits it after the money has been appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that, there being no law on the subject of the disposition of mileage not paid, this would be a limitation upon this appropriation, and it is in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a very few words on this general subject. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] is reported in the RECORD to have said yesterday—I could not hear him because of the great confusion—when I offered this amendment in a rather imperfect form:

I have often, not only in this House, but in other legislative bodies, heard that cheap amendment offered, such as has been offered by the gentleman from Ohio, before.

Now, I want to simply disabuse the mind of the gentleman from Georgia that this is a silly amendment, or an amendment made as a joke. It is, to my mind, a very serious amendment, and I make it in all good faith and in all seriousness. If this money is due to the Members of this House, and I believe it is, each individual Member of the House has a duty to perform, first, in the question of the appropriation of the money, and that is a public duty that he owes to the whole body, and secondly, a duty that he owes to himself. If, in his individual judgment, this money ought not to be paid to himself, I provide a remedy by which he can put it back into the Treasury, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the fact that he is in error when he says that we can put money into the Treasury of the United States.

He could not do it. If this money is appropriated and placed to the credit of a Member of Congress in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms, the gentleman from Georgia nor any other gentleman can put that money into the Treasury of the United States, for there is no law authorizing it to go in. I for one would not put any money, under these circumstances, into what may be called the "conscience fund," about which there is a provision of law. So I am right in saying first that there is no avenue by which this money can go back into the Treasury except by the provision of law, and that provision I purpose to incorporate in this bill.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. In a moment, when I get through. In the second place, but for the further limitation of this second proviso a Member of Congress, if he saw fit, could leave the money standing as a credit to him, never to be barred by the statutes of limitation. It is a claim in his own favor at some subsequent date and a claim in favor of his estate after he is dead.

Now, we had some exploiting of conditions of this sort a good many years ago in this country. I remember a single case at the time of the "salary grab," as it was called, where a Member of Congress, whose name I shall not mention, voted against it and declared in a public interview that was telegraphed all over this country that he would not take it. Fifteen years afterwards I happened to be in the Treasury and a clerk there called my attention to the fact that, beginning seven or eight years after the gentleman had gone out of Congress, he began to check against that money and checked it all out. [Laughter.]

Now, my proposition is, and I think everybody will be in favor of it who desires to meet this question fairly, first, that every man shall vote as he sees fit on the question of the appropriation, and if the appropriation is carried, let him not undertake to dodge the responsibility that grows out of the appropriation of this money, but let him march right up like a man and do one of two things—either take the money or turn the money back into the Treasury, as he well may if he agrees with me in my position on this question. That, Mr. Chairman, is the purpose of my amendment. [Applause.] It is to put it beyond the manipulation in the coming election by demagogues. Stand up and take your money or give it back to the Treasury of the United States. That is the whole of it; that is all there is in this amendment. It is very simple, very plain and obvious, and the way to peace of mind and dignity of purpose and action on the part of every Member of this House. [Laughter and applause.] Now, I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, in my reply to the gentleman from Ohio yesterday that I did not need his advice about what to do with the money, or what I should do with it, I was under the impression that if the money was not drawn from the Treasury on the 1st of July it was covered back into the Treasury.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If I understand the law, and I am told by a gentleman recently Solicitor of the Treasury that I am correct, it takes two years before it lapses. But in this case it will be money in the hands of the disbursing officer belonging to the Member, and if my amendment is defeated it will remain for years.

Mr. MADDOX. Then how did the man that the gentleman refers to draw it out after seven years?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That was the trouble; a question arose whether the money was an ordinary appropriation, and it was decided that it became a credit to him against the Government and was not an appropriation within the meaning of the statute. Therefore it would never lapse back.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, from my view of the case, from what I believe to be the law, I think I am still right in respect to that matter that this mileage would lapse back into the Treasury on the 1st day of July unless it were drawn out.

Now, I want to repeat that when the gentleman talks about demagogues and wants us to march up to the issue, I want to say that I will meet him on the issue at this place or any other place. I never dodged a question that came up in this House during the twelve years that I have been here.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, I have no controversy with the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MADDOX. Then, I can not understand what the gentleman meant when he referred to demagogues; I am the only man that has spoken on this matter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I only used the word in reference to a question to be met hereafter.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to say to the gentleman, without giving him an opportunity to use up my time, that I stand ready now and have upon all propositions, as I always have in this House on all occasions, to vote upon any proposition, and I intend to do it now. Now, what have we got presented to us? In a few words I want to briefly state my position. The Chair has ruled, and we accept the ruling, that we have had two sessions.

But there was only a shadow of time, something which can be only imagined, that existed between those two sessions. We were all here or ought to have been in our seats when the adjournment took place and when the new session began. By my side, perhaps, sits a man from the Pacific coast, taking probably $2,500 of mileage, myself $270, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DENNY] $16, and yet, without traveling or incurring any expenses, the gentleman from the Pacific coast will add to his salary $2,500 and the gentleman from Maryland $16 and myself $270, so that the effect of it is to add to our salaries a sum of money for doing absolutely nothing and with no consideration given therefor, besides operating as a gross discrimination against some of us.

Now, the question is, Is it expedient, is it honest, to do anything of that sort? We have been calling upon these various Departments for a statement of the expenditure of money for carriages and automobiles and things of that sort that were not provided for by law. I want to say to you, gentlemen of the committee, that if you expect to have any effect upon these Departments and upon the country toward correcting these evils you must first sweep before your own door; the spring must be clear if you expect the water to be clear below it—the fountain must be pure. We have the right as Representatives to vote this money, under the ruling of the Chair, into our pockets, if we see proper, but the question is, Are we equitably entitled to it? That is the question. I do not think so, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act no Senator or Member of the House of Representatives shall be entitled to receive mileage for any session of Congress or of the Senate commenced within three days after the adjournment of any session for which he has received or is entitled to mileage.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, that is not wholly original with me, for it represents the principle of a law that was passed in 1852, and which may be in force to-day, and I have no doubt that it will surprise this House to know that that was apparently originated to cure an abuse which arose in that center of economy and altruism, the United States Senate. At that time the Senate had obviously contracted the habit of taking mileage for the executive session which is always called at the beginning of every Presidential term, and so in 1851 a law was passed prohibiting any Senator from taking mileage for the session beginning March 4, 1853, and the sessions every four years thereafter. The next year—in 1852—Congress went a step further and made this principle apply to both House and Senate by a law which said:

The above act shall apply to all extra sessions of Congress or of the Senate convened within ten days after the adjournment of a regular session.

In other words, it provided that whenever one Congress comes within ten days of another the second Congress is not entitled to mileage. I fancy that Congressmen in those days were just as fond of mileage as we are; that they did not legislate from any unwillingness to take it, but that it was under the stress of public opinion that they refused to take mileage for one session when it came within ten days of another; and it seems to me the same public opinion holds to-day and that although, of course, we have a right to vote ourselves any amount of mileage, as we have the right to vote ourselves any amount of compensation, at the same time public opinion recognizes that when one Congress ends and another begins immediately there is no travel and there ought to be no mileage. It seems to me that the same law which they passed then offers a good example for us to follow to-day, and that we ought to adopt this amendment which I have offered, and thus settle the practice conclusively. If this fails, I shall vote for the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], to strike out the appropriation; but that still leaves us with a technical legal claim on the Treasury which any subsequent appropriation bill may satisfy. This amendment of mine not only accomplishes more perfectly the object he aims at now, but it also settles the law and the right for the future.

I think myself we ought to go a step further. I think we ought to consolidate all these different methods we have of getting compensation. I would strike out all mileage and give every Member of the House $500 in lieu thereof. That would cost the Treasury about the same as now, and would make the division among the Members much more equal, although that would favor those who live near by as the present law favors those who live far off. I would strike out the stationery and give every Member $125, as at present. That makes $625. I would strike out clerk hire, for which we get $1,200, and strike out all the limitations about it by which we are not allowed to make our own contracts. That would make $1,825. Then I would give every man $675 more in lieu of office rent and repeal this law that we have passed to build a big office building. I think the interest on the money required to erect that building, and its running expenses, would amount to more than $675 per Member, and I think with that sum each Member could get accommodations more satisfactory to himself than the office building. This would give to each Member $2,500 in lieu of mileage and stationery and clerk hire and office rent, and allow him to expend it as he pleases. It would not cost the country, I believe, a dollar more than it is paying to-day, and it would not be giving us anything more except in the office rent, but I think it would make it a great deal more comfortable for us all. It would allow us to make any contracts we please about our clerks. Each man could pay as much and save as much as he pleased, and while benefiting us would not cost the country anything.

But, of course, that would not be permissible here, as it would be clearly subject on this bill to a point of order and ought to be passed on carefully by a committee.

But I think myself that all these perquisites, as they might be called, ought to be wiped out, and we ought to give ourselves the money to use as we please. I do not believe the people think that we are overpaid to-day, and, of course, it is only because we are afraid of public opinion that we do not raise our salaries. This proposition of mine would not raise our salaries in the sense of costing the Treasury more than we do to-day, but at the same time, by consolidating our different accounts, it would be to our advantage and convenience. I think that we ought not to take this extra mileage, whether it is technically compensation or not, because, although mileage has come to be a mere matter of phrase and is not used to pay for our traveling expenses, yet the people, the country at large, look upon it as compensation for going home and coming back, and if we take it now they will say that we are taking an allowance for thus going home and coming back, when, in fact, we had just a second in which to make the journey. Therefore, while we have unquestionably a legal right to it and this appropriation simply carries out existing law, I think we would be very unwise to take it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] whether he offered this amendment as a substitute for the text of the bill or as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. As a substitute for the text of the bill.

Mr. BAKER. I should like to ask the Chair whether the law cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts is the present law or not? If it is the present law, must not the Chair rule that this section is out of order as new legislation?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not the law; the gentleman from Massachusetts did not so state.

Mr. BAKER. I asked the Chair that question because I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say he was in doubt.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not the law. The only law on the subject to-day is the act of 1866.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, the question of order having been disposed of, the real question involved in this proposition is now before the House. It is raised by the presence in the bill of these paragraphs providing for mileage, and by the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to strike them out. The question is now whether we ought to adopt that motion or ought to pass the bill with those paragraphs retained in it.

In my judgment, the motion to strike out ought to prevail. I do not believe that the Chairman is correct in his construction of the law in regarding mileage as a part of our compensation. I do not believe that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is correct in his conclusion that there is no doubt about the correctness of the construction given to this statute by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. On the contrary, I believe the compensation is $5,000 per year; and, in addition to the compensation, mileage at a specified rate is allowed. Note the reading of the provision itself:

That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $5,000 per annum; to be computed from the first day of the present Congress.

That language of the clause last quoted has reference, of course, to the particular Congress which passed the act, and has no meaning now, so that, eliminating that clause, and bringing the remainder of the words into closer connection, the provision is:

That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $5,000 per annum, and in addition thereto mileage—

At the specified rate.

The construction which gentlemen put upon those words "in addition thereto" makes them return to the "$5,000." That is the construction of the Chairman, and the construction which the gentleman from Alabama adopts. I do not take the same view. The words "in addition thereto" mean, I think, "in addition to the compensation." The compensation is $5,000, and in addition to the compensation mileage is given. I believe the language properly carries that meaning without construction, or, if construed, requires that construction as the only proper construction.

But if the "mileage" is "compensation," why should the Representative from California or the Delegate from Hawaii have greater compensation than the Representative in Congress from the city of Baltimore, who has but about 40 miles to travel?

I know the answer will come very readily, "Because the Delegate from Hawaii or the Representative from California has very much farther to travel than the Representative from Baltimore." Had he farther to travel to attend this session of Congress, calling this the second session?

If there is a division between these sessions, so that instead of this being a part of the session which began the 9th day of November we are in another session which began the first Monday in December, the session beginning the 9th of November ending at the same moment of time when the other session began—however that may be, and that has been determined by the ruling of the Chair, as affecting this matter—everybody knows that it was an absolute physical impossibility for any Member of Congress or any Delegate to go to his home and return therefrom in the filmy period of time, or supposed period of time, existing between the ending of the one session and the beginning of the other.

Then, if "mileage" be "compensation," the Representative in Congress from the city of Baltimore is equitably entitled to just as much of the mileage carried by this bill, and entitled to it by just as good a right, in fact, as the Representative in Congress from a district in California or the Delegate in Congress from Hawaii.

Are we really entitled to this mileage? Waiving the question whether we have the legal, naked, technical right to vote it to ourselves, are we entitled to it? The mileage, I believe, is intended as an allowance for the necessary travel from our homes to the place of the assembling of Congress and the return, at the conclusion of the session, from the place where Congress sits to our homes.

Now, inasmuch as we did not and could not make this trip, could not earn this mileage, could not equitably be entitled to this allowance for anything that could have transpired or did transpire between the time when the session called by the President ended, or might be supposed to have ended, and the time when the session provided for by the Constitution began, or might be supposed to have begun; inasmuch as that was an impossibility; inasmuch as nobody did any traveling or could do any traveling between those sessions in that infinitesimally minute portion of time—if any there was—between them (conceding to anybody else, of course, the same right of opinion which I assert for myself, and imputing to nobody any worse motives than those which actuate me, and claiming for myself no better ones than those which may influence the vote of any other gentleman), I believe that we ought not to vote this mileage to ourselves, but ought to vote against it and take it out of the bill.

In that belief I for one shall vote to strike it out; shall vote against its retention in the bill; shall vote against the passage of the bill if it be left in it; shall, if I can get recognition, if it remain in the bill, offer a motion to recommit the bill with instructions to the Committee on Appropriations to strike it out. I shall do this just simply in the exercise of my judgment and the performance of my duty as I see it, without any reflection upon anybody, and without assuming any superior knowledge or any superior virtue in the matter.

That is all I desire to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. BAKER. Do I understand the Chair to rule that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair held that it was.

Mr. BAKER. Then I will discuss that as well as the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the legal aspects of this matter, it seems to me perfectly obvious that the Members of this House must decide this as a question of morality, as a question of equity. I can not agree with those who construe the language of the statute to mean that the $5,000 salary and the mileage taken together are compensation. There can, in my judgment, be no such construction. The $5,000 is the salary of everybody who is a Member of this House. The mileage is obviously to equalize the difference in the cost of reaching Washington. That being so, if it is impossible, as it is, waiving the question whether there was an infinitesimal space of time between the adjournment of the first session and the convening of the second, it is perfectly obvious that there could not have been any traveling on the part of the Members of Congress who were doing their duty.

If they were here attending to their duty as Members of Congress they could not have done any traveling between those two sessions, and obviously that being so no one can claim any right to mileage for the second session of Congress. To admit that they have a right as compensation is to say, as in the words of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], that Members from California shall each get $1,250 more compensation than the law permits, while gentlemen from Maryland or New York shall get $16 or $100 more. Obviously there could be no such intent when the statute was made. The statute clearly was to equalize the disadvantage, to equalize as between Members of Congress the cost of reaching this body, and there can be no claim in equity for the payment of this mileage when there has been no possibility for anyone to return to his home and to come again on the convening of the second session, even if it is admitted to be a second session.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, is not debate on this amendment exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is made, the Chair will have to hold that debate is exhausted on this amendment. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest to the gentleman that that is an amendment to the amendment now pending, and is not in order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, have I the floor?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not desire to cut off debate, but I desire to go ahead with the business of the House. We have had this matter discussed fully two hours yesterday and two hours to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the motion to strike out the last word of the substitute, as an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, is in order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that in twenty minutes all debate on this paragraph and amendment be closed.

Several MEMBERS. Five minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Put it at ten minutes. I ask unanimous consent that in ten minutes debate on this paragraph and all amendments be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment and paragraph be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. All amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. That includes all of them. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is an important question, involving a principle, and it also seems to me that the amendment made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] tends to belittle that question and ignore that principle. This is a matter which should not be degraded to the question of whether individual Members shall take mileage money or not after it has been legalized. It is not a matter to be decided by the individual, but it seems to me that it is a matter which should be decided now by the collective conscience of Congress. As the gentleman from Missouri has said, if there is not any competent reason why this mileage should be voted, Congress should be fair enough and square enough and true enough to its conscience as a body to vote in favor of striking out this paragraph allowing mileage.

It is very true, as the gentleman from Ohio has stated, that no man is compelled to take this mileage money after it is once voted; but it is also true that one of the great evils of this country to-day is governmental extravagance, and this Congress should set an example to other Departments of the Government by refusing to vote to its Members compensation which none of them have earned and which none of them can be tempted to accept if this paragraph is stricken out.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is not fair, nor wise, nor in the public interest for Congress to vote a questionable compensation and invite each Member to decide for himself whether it is right. That would be under this amendment to allow a man to legislate for himself and decide for himself whether mileage should be allowed. This is an important question, not for the amount of money involved, but in the principle involved, and this Congress should not vote money for any purpose which is not justified by public service and by public needs.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Ohio in offering this amendment is belittling the question which is really before the House, and, as I said, he places it in a light in which it should not be placed. I think the House of Representatives, now that this question has been raised, should set the example to all the Departments of this Government of refusing to vote public money not legitimately required for public purposes. There has been no traveling necessary for public purposes at this session; let there be no mileage allowed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who would receive or be authorized to receive a considerable amount of money if this mileage should be voted. The amount is larger, perhaps, than the average Member receives, but I believe that not I individually, but the House of Representatives as an authority, should say emphatically by its vote, "The public money shall not be used in these cases, and shall not be authorized in other cases, for any purpose when not legitimately required for public uses and public needs." [Applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I think will settle all this trouble. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether his amendment is an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, or an amendment to the substitute?

Mr. OLMSTED. I offer it as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid to any Member of either branch of Congress who shall not certify that he did in point of fact go to and return from his home between the first and second sessions of the Fifty-eighth Congress."

[Laughter.]

Mr. McDERMOTT. I ask the gentleman to put in "and that he paid his fare going to and coming from." [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey is not in order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts for the text of the paragraph as amended.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The substitute was again reported.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he make that "adjournment or end." I suggest that amendment to the amendment, making it "adjournment or end."

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will accept the suggestion offered by the gentleman of "adjournment or end."

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is a proposition that is clearly subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was not made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They are now proceeding to perfect the amendment, and when it is perfected I desire to make the point of order.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It is too late, Mr. Chairman, for the point of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Why, it is too late.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, they are just perfecting it and are making changes in it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. After an amendment has been once offered and is in order, any amendment to perfect it is in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will submit it to the Chair.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well; I do not care.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the gentleman from Massachusetts in order to modify the amendment will have to withdraw it and then offer it in the modified form.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Well, I do not dare to do that, because I fear the point of order will be raised; therefore I would prefer to leave it as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer it as an amendment to be voted on.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I offer as an amendment that the words "or end" be inserted after the word "adjournment."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts proposes an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "adjournment" insert the words "or end;" so as to read "adjournment or end."

Mr. SHOBER. I make the point of order on this substitute—the point of order being that it is a piece of legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes too late—it has been debated.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama is pending——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I submitted two motions. There are two paragraphs in the bill, one providing mileage for the House and one providing mileage for the Senate. I moved to strike out both paragraphs, and I ask unanimous consent be given that both may be voted on at once.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the vote will be on the motion to strike out both paragraphs. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, to strike out both paragraphs.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MADDOX. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will order that this vote be taken by tellers, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] will act as tellers.

The question was again taken by tellers; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 167, noes none.

So the amendment was agreed to. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

The Clerk resumed, and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I now ask to return to the bottom of page 43 for the purpose of making the point of order that I raised yesterday. I will read the whole paragraph, a part of which I object to:

Removal of intruders, Five Civilized Tribes: For the purpose of removing intruders and placing allottees in unrestricted possession of their allotments, $15,000.

The objectionable part of this paragraph is the words "removal of intruders," in line 22, and "removing intruders and," in line 23. Now, for the purpose of eliminating these objectionable words, I offer an amendment which I understand will be satisfactory to the chairman of the committee. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out, in line 21, "removal of intruders;" and in line 23 the words "removing intruders and."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 22, page 43, strike out the words "removal of intruders;" and in line 23 strike out the words "removing intruders and;" so that the paragraph as amended will read as follows, viz:

"Five Civilized Tribes: For the purpose of placing allottees in unrestricted possession of their allotments, $15,000."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order if the amendment is to be adopted, as I understand it is satisfactory to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be considered as agreed to without objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks upon this question in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the object of my amendment is to strike out the words "removal of intruders" from lines 22 and 23 on page 43 of the bill, for the reason that if these words are left in the bill the Indian inspectors—J. George Wright or Guy P. Cobb—or the Indian agent could use the power of the Government to remove any person residing on Indian lands that they might for any reason desire to remove. The bill as amended will only permit them to remove trespassers from lands already allotted to some individual Indian for the sole purpose of placing the allottee in possession of his land.

Mr. Chairman, this paragraph as amended is in exact accord with section 23 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, which only authorizes "an Indian agent, upon the application of the allottee, to place him in possession of his allotment."

Mr. Chairman, I object to placing in the hands of these Indian inspectors the power to remove, at their discretion, any person that they might call an intruder from any land in the Indian Territory. This power, in my judgment, has been used and could and would again be used by these Government officers for private speculation, and the power thus given them would enable them to make money illegitimately out of their official positions.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that I am making a strong charge of official corruption against public officials; but, sir, there is abundant proof to sustain my charges, and if this Congress would do its duty the Interior Department's conduct of affairs in the Indian Territory would be fully and fairly investigated by Congress and the guilty parties brought to justice.

I understand that Mr. Bonaparte and a Mr. Chalmers have been sent to the Indian Territory to investigate the charges of grafting and corruption coming from that unfortunate Territory; but no report has been furnished us from these gentlemen. I believe that the unfortunate condition in that Territory is largely due to the arbitrary, stupid, law-defying, and vacillating course pursued by the present Secretary of the Interior. Any man who is naturally an autocrat, with autocratic powers placed in his hands by Congress, is a dangerous man to intrust with the property rights of a vast and rich country like the Indian Territory.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. S. M. Brosius, an agent of the Indian Rights Association, went to the Indian Territory last August, and in his official character and after a full investigation made the following report to Mr. Garrett, the president of the Indian Rights Association. This letter was sent by Mr. Garrett to Secretary Hitchcock, and is as follows:

[Springfield (Mass.) Republican, August 18, 1903.]

KNAVERY IN INDIAN TERRITORY—DAWES COMMISSION ACCUSED OF MAKING MONEY BY DEFRAUDING THE INDIAN—THE WORST SCANDAL OF THE SORT.

PHILIP C. GARRETT, President Indian Rights Association:

A study of the conditions now existing among the Five Civilized Tribes in Indian Territory impresses one that there is need of a change of management in the interests of the Indians. The Territory has rapidly filled up by reason of privileges granted for location of town sites, and this still increasing population seeks to secure title to the land allotted the Indians under agreements with the Dawes Commission. It is difficult for the sojourner to realize that he is within a Territory belonging to the Indians, whose every interest should be guarded by the Government. The hope of the townsmen is to secure title to lands at the earliest possible moment, and, of course, with the vast majority, no thought is given the prior interest and future welfare of the Indian.

In consequence of this condition, the announcement by the Secretary of the Interior that all sales of lands by individual Creek Indians, secured through manipulation of trust company or land sharks, should be disapproved, and the lands offered for sale by advertisement for sealed bids, created a veritable panic among those who were to profit by the former plan. The injustice resulting from the system discarded by the Secretary was but a repetition of the experience of the Department in the sale of inherited Indian lands within all reservations. In the case of the Creeks, however, a more systematic monopoly seems to have existed, so that trust companies or their henchmen were the chief manipulators to profit thereby. The plan of the few companies and others securing lands from the Indian owner included a contract of the sale at the termination of the lease, without additional consideration.

The prices at which the lands were secured varied from 25 to 75 cents per acre, these lands in turn being sublet to the farmer at from $1 to $2.50 per acre, which shows the opportunity for immense profits covering the Creek reservation alone, which comprises over 3,000,000 acres. The main criticism of the Secretary's order calling for sealed bids came from this class of dealers, who have been inducing the owner to dispose of his land by paying a cash bonus that always seems so alluring to the Indian. The advances thus made are of course a total loss now that the sales are to be made over again.

The farmer who desires to improve a home for himself now feels that he may offer a fair remuneration for the lands to the Government and not be compelled to pay a commission to the trust company as a middleman in the deal, as under the former plan he would be compelled to do, since these companies secured a large share of the lands.

The system adopted by the Dawes Commission for the allotment of the lands of the Cherokees is criticised as being too technical and expensive for the Indians. Each Cherokee is entitled to an allotment of lands valued at $325. To secure this he is now compelled to appear at the office of the Dawes Commission in Tahlequah, which means traveling 150 miles from the distant portions of the reservation. The applicant may remain at Tahlequah awaiting his turn to file on his selection for a month or even longer. His scanty store of ready cash exhausted, he becomes discouraged, and perhaps from dire necessity returns home without having been able to file at all. The small patrimony from the tribe will soon become exhausted under these conditions and the Indian left practically no better off than before he secured title to his portion of lands.

Taking as a basis the number of daily filings on several days when business was evidently not active with the Commission, it is computed that the work of the Commission will not be completed for some thirty-odd years. These figures of the expert mathematician serve to show at least the need of greater activity in the work.

One of the flagrant wrongs to the Cherokees lies in the manner of dealing with excessive land holdings. Section 18 of the agreement with the Cherokees, ratified and approved August 7, 1902, provides that "it shall be unlawful after ninety days after the ratification of the act by the Cherokees for any member of the Cherokee tribe to inclose or hold possession of, in any manner, by himself or through another, directly or indirectly, more lands in value than that of 110 acres of average allotable lands of the Cherokee Nation, either for himself or his wife, or for each of his minor children, if members of said tribe; and any member of said tribe found in such possession of lands or having the same in any manner inclosed, after the expiration of ninety days after the date of the ratification of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

Immense fortunes have been made in the past by citizen Cherokees through taking advantage of the opportunities to inclose large tracts of tribal lands, both for purposes of cropping and herding of cattle. The section quoted refers to this class of excessive holders, which by the act are subject to fine and imprisonment after November 7, 1902, section 19 of the act providing that each day upon which the misdemeanor continues shall be deemed a separate offense.

Divers schemes are resorted to by the excessive holder to evade the law, with more or less success; and it is claimed that even now, although eight months after excessive holding has been declared unlawful, large tracts are held for profit by this class of persons.

The law did not contemplate that the excessive holder should be paid for the improvements on the land after ninety days from the ratification of the act, since he had many times over been reimbursed by way of large profits for the use of the same. By delay or lax methods opportunities have been given these excessive holders to make sale of the improvements, and it is stated that the Dawes Commission will not even now permit filings to be made on the excessive holdings unless by arrangement with the holder thereof. The larger number of the Cherokees are not able to pay the prices asked for improvements that, under the law, should be free for them to file upon without pay. It seems apparent that the right of the excessive holders should have been determined at the earliest possible moment, so that opportunity would have been given all members of the tribe to file on this class of lands, which as a rule are the better quality. To be sure, contest may be instituted by any member against the excessive holder, but these afford scanty relief for the poverty-stricken Indian, ignorant of business methods.

Mention has been made of the interest of the trust companies in dealing in Indian lands. These companies have been organized by the score and cover every field of the Five Tribes open for investment. They are the chief manipulators in Indian lands, either in leasing, subleasing, and (before the recent ruling of the Secretary of the Interior) purchasing of Creek lands. These trust and development companies are the available avenue for the influential excessive holder to retain the use of his lands in evasion of the law. The companies employ men well equipped for field work. These (often in collusion with excessive holders) buy out the latter's rights, and usually bring to the land office of the Dawes Commission ignorant members of the tribes and see that they make proper filing thereon. A lease covering five years for agricultural purposes is executed at the time in favor of the company or to the middleman who operates in their interests.

The Indian who thus files on his allotment usually pays for the improvements by turning over the rents and profits on the land to the trust company, so that during the term of the lease the allottee receives but little or no benefit from the lands, while the excessive holder has in turn retained possession for another five years. Others well versed in the mode of securing Indians for the purpose of filing bring them in from remote districts and turn them over to the companies for the best figure obtainable, according to the demand and the shrewdness of the manipulators. On one occasion during my stay in the Territory I was informed that one of these rustlers had brought in thirty Choctaws and Chickasaws, another one twenty-six, and yet a third a less number, to be sold to the Tribal Trust Company at from $20 to $30 per head. The Indian who hesitates to take advantage of the offer is tempted into acquiescence by proffer of sufficient cash in hand to close the deal, and thus transfers all rights to his home for the time the lease is to run; and if the trade included his better lands he will likely become a vagabond among his people, as the tribal relations are now broken up and the surplus tribal lands will no doubt soon be disposed of.

Practically the same tactics are employed by the oil and gas companies in securing leases of oil lands, and the air is rife with scandal in connection therewith. There is this difference, however, the oil lands cover but a limited portion of the reservations.

In the Bartlesville district there is a scramble for oil lands by the principal operating companies, which often results in gross injustice to the Indians. In a case recently reported to the Indian Office by the writer protest was made against the approval of a lease covering the homestead rights of a mother and two minor children. The Indian mother, being ignorant of values, was induced to give up the lands that had been in possession of the family for many years upon being paid $300 each for the three tracts, while the person securing the same received $20,000 from the oil company for his share of the profits. From the fact that the Indian mother was not empowered to act for the minor children in disposing of the real estate it is believed that the transaction will be declared void.

Frequent complaint has been made that the law has been violated in relation to excessive holdings of land. It is claimed that Indians going to the land office would be told that if they would lease their lands to certain persons they would be given choice lands from excessive holdings, or be allowed to file on lands set apart under the twenty-fifth section of the Curtis Act, approved June 28, 1898, and the twenty-third section of the Cherokee agreement, for the benefit of the Delawares. The two acts provided for the segregation of the lands within the Cherokee Nation for the benefit of the Delawares. The Dawes Commission on January 1, 1903, segregated the lands as provided for by law, but after this permitted about two hundred filings to be made thereon by Cherokees, and doubtless would have continued such privileges had not the Delawares brought injunction proceedings and obtained a temporary restraining order against the Secretary of the Interior and the Dawes Commission.

At a later date the Commission seems to have ignored the action previously taken, and recommended to the Secretary of the Interior that steps be "taken to guard against the possibility of the Supreme Court rendering a judgment adopting such schedule as to definite and specific tracts of land to which the Delawares are entitled under their claim," etc. The unusual interest manifested by the Commission in this matter is worthy of consideration, as it is alleged to favor interested parties in securing leases. The lands segregated by the Delawares have proved to be most valuable oil tracts, and it is known that leases are now pending before the Department, executed by Cherokees who have been allowed to file on these identical lands. The ignorant Indian without means—and this class embraces perhaps one-third of the population of the Five Tribes—is practically at the mercy of the trust companies and other dealers in land, since they have no means of traveling long distances, where that is necessary, and providing for their expenses during the long delays at the land office before shown.

The interest of the trust companies being antagonistic to those of the Indians in many ways, it will be interesting to know of their organization, their promoters, and the scope of their powers as authorized by charter. The articles of agreement and incorporation of the Tribal Development Company, of Tishomingo, Ind. T., show that it was organized March 25, 1903, with a capital stock of $100,000 and $12,000 actually paid in. Guy P. Cobb, who held the position of internal-revenue inspector for the Indian Territory, is the largest stockholder. P. L. Soper is also a large stockholder and vice-president of the company. Mr. Soper is a United States district attorney for the northern district, Indian Territory, whose duty under the law is to prosecute persons having excessive holdings of lands, and to defend the Indians in all suits of law and equity involving title to their lands. P. S. Mosely, governor of the Chickasaw Nation, is also a stockholder. The general nature of the business of the tribal development is to "purchase, own, sell, encumber, lease, sublease, and exchange real estate, and to act as agent and certify abstract of title," etc.

The Muskogee Title and Trust Company was organized February 24, 1903, and is authorized to transact a general banking business, and in addition may "buy, sell, and lease lands and buy and sell stocks and bonds of other corporations," etc. Tams Bixby, chairman of the Dawes Commission, is a stockholder and vice-president of the concern. J. George Wright, Indian inspector in charge of the Indian Territory, is one of the directors of the company.

The Canadian Valley Trust Company, of Muskogee, Ind. T., was organized February 25, 1903, and is authorized by its charter to "buy, rent, sell, lease, and mortgage real estate" and conduct a general banking business. Tams Bixby is a stockholder and president of this trust company. G. W. Hopkins, chief law clerk for the Dawes Commission, resigned that post, it is stated, to accept an important position with this company, as did also P. G. Reuter, clerk in charge of the land office under the Commission.

International Banking Trust Company, organized February 4, 1903, with its main office at Vinita, Ind. T., has the same general powers to "buy, sell, and mortgage real estate and personal property." Thomas B. Needles, a member of the Dawes Commission, is vice-president and director of this company. Charles A. Davidson, clerk of the United States court, Vinita, Ind. T., is also a director. James H. Hucklebery, assistant United States attorney, northern district, Indian Territory, is stated to be attorney for this trust company, and James H. Hucklebery, jr., is given as one of the stockholders in a prospectus issued by the same company. C. R. Breckenridge, a member of the Dawes Commission, is also credited as being interested as a stockholder, either directly or indirectly, in Eufaula Trust Company, Eufaula, Ind. T. Tams Bixby is understood to have been owner of real estate in various sections of the Indian Territory—Fort Gibson, Tahlequah, Tishomingo, and Sulphur Springs among the others.

P. L. Soper, United States district attorney, in addition to being a stockholder in the Tribal Development Company, as already shown, is stated to be a stockholder in and attorney for the Cherokee Oil and Gas Company, which is operating in the Indian Territory, with original charter rights granted in Arkansas. He is also stated to be a general counsel for the St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company for the Indian Territory, whose interests frequently conflict with those of the Indians. The following from the Weekly Examiner, of Bartlesville, Ind. T., issue of July 11, 1903, shows that Mr. Soper is interested in still another company dealing in Indian lands:

"The oil company with which it seems District Attorney Soper is identified is the Indian Territory Development Company, a corporation which has secured a big block of a most promising oil territory in the Bartlesville field and which holds extremely valuable coal and zinc lands in the Cherokee Nation."

There are rumors afloat to the effect that Federal officers in the Indian Territory are financially interested in other transactions that would seem to preclude them from retaining their positions under the Indian Department.

With the information in possession of the various officers of the Government employed in the Indian Territory it is clear that they possess a great advantage over others in pressing any business with which they may have an interest, either through a trust company or otherwise. The prestige they have with the Indian and others, by reason of their official relations, is very important. The same caution should govern the management of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes as in private business transactions.

Very respectfully,

S. M. BROSIUS,
Agent Indian Rights Association.

Mr. Chairman, the above report shows that Mr. J. George Wright and Mr. Cobb and three members of the Dawes Commission and other United States officials have been members of tribal development companies, not so much, I imagine, to develop the Indians as to develop and enlarge their own pocketbooks by dealing in Indian lands and improvements. For the purpose of showing the objects and purposes of these development companies I will read a letter signed by Guy P. Cobb, and sent to Mrs. Emma Black, at Marrietta, Ind. T. It is as follows:

TRIBAL DEVELOPMENT COMPANY (INCORPORATED).

CAPITAL, $100,000.

INDIAN TERRITORY INVESTMENTS.

MRS. EMMA BLACK, Marietta, Ind. T.

DEAR MADAM: We have entered into contracts with a large number of Indian citizens who have been unable to secure suitable lands upon which to make the selection of their allotments, and desire to secure a large quantity of land for their use. Part of these citizens desire to select pasture lands and part are desirous of securing farm lands. We are prepared to make or consider propositions to secure such land by buying outright the improvements thereon, together with the right of occupancy and improvements, by allowing the present owner the use and benefit of such lands for a limited period, or we will contract to act as agent, making contracts between the owner of the improvements and the Indian selecting the land.

If you are in position where we can be of service to you, we will be pleased to enter into negotiations. If you are not, we would esteem it a favor to be placed in correspondence with any person in your vicinity who is unable to hold the land they now occupy or desire to dispose of the same for any other reason.

If you make us a proposition, give location and description of land and improvements, together with terms, so that we may act without delay.

Very respectfully,

TRIBAL DEVELOPMENT CO.,
Per GUY P. COBB,
Treasurer and General Manager.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope that this letter and Mr. Brosius's report makes it clear that Mr. Cobb and Mr. Wright are not proper men to spend $15,000 of Government funds for the purpose of enabling them to dispossess anyone of Indian lands, and this amendment offered by me will deprive these gentlemen of a chance to use Government funds for the purpose of making money for their Tribal Development Company.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 3, line 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to return to page 3, line 6. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 6 the words "five hundred;" so that it will read "$2,000 per annum."

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, page 3, strike out the words "five hundred;" so that it will read "at the rate of $2,000 per annum."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will say that in the diplomatic bill the salary is fixed at $2,000, and we desire to fix the same salary in this bill.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, in lines 8 and 9, in lieu of the sum now inserted there, I move to insert the sum of "$6,301.29."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 8 and 9, correct the total so that it will read "$6,301.29."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAWNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10954, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendments? If not, they will be considered in gross.

The amendments were considered and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

STATUE OF JAMES MARQUETTE.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of concurrent resolution No. 38.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution No. 38.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be given to the people of Wisconsin for the statue of James Marquette, the renowned missionary and explorer.

Resolved, That the statue be accepted, to remain in the national Statuary Hall, in the Capitol of the nation, and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the presiding officers of the House of Representatives and Senate, be forwarded to his excellency the governor of the State of Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if this is the usual course?

Mr. OTJEN. This is the usual form of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. OTJEN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HISTORY OF CONSTRUCTION OF UNITED STATES CAPITOL BUILDING.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit, as a report from commission to acquire site for and direct and supervise construction of the office building for the House of Representatives, documentary history of the construction and development of the United States Capitol building and grounds. And I ask that the same be printed, together with accompanying illustrations, and laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SIOUX TRIBE OF INDIANS, SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota demands the regular order, which is the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10418) to ratify and amend an agreement with the Sioux tribe of Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, in South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill to ratify and amend an agreement with the Sioux tribe of Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, in South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect.

Whereas James McLaughlin, United States Indian inspector, did on the 14th day of September, A. D. 1901, make and conclude an agreement with the male adult Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, which said agreement is in words and figures as follows:

This agreement made and entered into on the 14th day of September, 1901, by and between James McLaughlin, United States Indian inspector, on the part of the United States, and the Sioux tribe of Indians belonging on the Rosebud Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, witnesseth:

ARTICLE I. The said Indians belonging to the Rosebud Reservation, S. Dak., for the consideration hereinafter named, do hereby cede, surrender, grant, and convey to the United States all their claim, right, title, and interest in and to all that part of the Rosebud Indian Reservation now remaining unallotted, situated within the boundaries of Gregory County, S. Dak., described more particularly as follows: Commencing in the middle of the main channel of the Missouri River at the intersection of the south line of Brule County; thence down said middle of the main channel of said river to the intersection of the ninety-ninth degree of west longitude from Greenwich; thence due south to the forty-third parallel of latitude; thence west along said parallel of latitude to its intersection with the tenth guide meridian; thence north along said guide meridian to its intersection with the township line between townships 100 and 101 north; thence east along said township line to the point of beginning, the unallotted land hereby ceded approximating 416,000 acres, lying and being within the boundaries of Gregory County, S. Dak., as said county is at present defined and organized.

ART. II. In consideration of the land ceded, relinquished, and conveyed by Article I of this agreement the United States stipulates and agrees to expend for and pay to said Indians, in the manner hereinafter provided, the sum of $1,040,000.

ART. III. It is agreed that of the amount to be expended for and paid to said Indians, as stipulated in Article II of this agreement, the sum of $250,000 shall be expended in the purchase of stock cattle of native range or graded Texas 2-year-old heifers and graded Durham or Hereford 2-year-old bulls for issue to said Indians, to be distributed as equally as possible among men, women, and children as soon as practicable after the ratification of this agreement, and that the sum of $790,000 shall be paid to said Indians per capita in cash in five annual installments of $158,000 each, the first of which cash payments shall be made within four months after the ratification of this agreement.

ART. IV. It is further agreed that all persons of the Rosebud Indian Reservation, S. Dak., who have been allotted lands and who are now recognized as members of the tribe belonging on said reservation, including mixed-bloods, whether their white blood comes from the paternal or maternal side, and the children born to them, shall enjoy the undisturbed and peaceable possession of their allotted lands, and shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of the tribe enjoyed by full-blood Indians upon the reservation; and that white men heretofore lawfully intermarried into the tribe and now living with their families upon said reservation shall have the right of residence thereon, not inconsistent with existing statutes.

ART. V. It is understood that nothing in this agreement shall be construed to deprive the said Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, S. Dak., of any benefits to which they are entitled under existing treaties or agreements, not inconsistent with the provisions of this agreement.

ART. VI. This agreement shall take effect and be in force when signed by United States Indian Inspector James McLaughlin and by three-fourths of the male adult Indians parties hereto and when accepted and ratified by the Congress of the United States.

In witness whereof the said James McLaughlin, United States Indian inspector, on the part of the United States, and the male adult Indians belonging on the Rosebud Reservation, S. Dak., have hereunto set their hands and seals at Rosebud Indian Agency, S. Dak., this 14th day of September, A. D. 1901.

JAMES MCLAUGHLIN,
United States Indian Inspector.

ROSEBUD AGENCY, S. DAK., October 4, 1901.

I certify that the total number of male adult Indians over 18 years of age belonging on the Rosebud Reservation, S. Dak., is 1,359, of whom 1,031 have signed the foregoing agreement, being 12 more than three-fourths of the male adult Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, S. Dak.

CHAS. E. MCCHESNEY,
United States Indian Agent.

ROSEBUD AGENCY, S. DAK., October 4, 1901.

Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the said agreement be, and the same hereby is, accepted, ratified, and confirmed as herein amended and modified, as follows:

"ARTICLE I. The said Indians belonging on the Rosebud Reservation, S. Dak., for the consideration hereinafter named, do hereby cede, surrender, grant, and convey to the United States all their claim, right, title, and interest in and to all that part of the Rosebud Indian Reservation now remaining unallotted, situated within the boundaries of Gregory County, S. Dak., described more particularly as follows: Commencing in the middle of the main channel of the Missouri River at the intersection of the south line of Brule County; thence down said middle of the main channel of said river to the intersection of the ninety-ninth degree of west longitude from Greenwich; thence due south to the forty-third parallel of latitude; thence west along said parallel of latitude to its intersection with the tenth guide meridian; thence north along said guide meridian to its intersection with the township line between townships 100 and 101 north; thence east along said township line to the point of beginning, the unallotted land hereby ceded approximating 416,000 acres, lying and being within the boundaries of Gregory County, S. Dak., as said county is at present defined and organized.

"ART. II. In consideration of the land ceded, relinquished, and conveyed by article 1 of this agreement, the United States stipulates and agrees to dispose of the same to settlers under the provision of the homestead and town-site laws, except sections 16 and 36, or an equivalent of two sections in each township, and to pay to said Indians the proceeds derived from the sale of said lands; and also the United States stipulates and agrees to pay for sections 16 and 36, or an equivalent of two sections in each township, $2.50 per acre.

"ART. III. It is agreed that of the amount to be derived from the sale of said lands to be paid to said Indians, as stipulated in article 2 of this agreement, the sum of $250,000 shall be expended in the purchase of stock cattle, of native range or graded Texas 2-year-old heifers and graded Durham or Hereford 2-year-old bulls, for issue to said Indians, to be distributed as equally as possible among men, women, and children, but not more than one-half of the money received in any one year shall be expended as aforesaid, and the other half shall be paid to said Indians per capita in cash, and an accounting, settlement, and payment shall be made in the month of October in each year until the lands are fully paid for and the funds distributed in accordance with this agreement: Provided, however, That not more than $500,000 shall be expended or paid within two years after the ratification of this agreement, and not to exceed $150,000 in each of the following years until the expiration of five years.

"ART. IV. It is further agreed that all persons of the Rosebud Indian Reservation, S. Dak., who have been allotted lands and who are now recognized as members of the tribe belonging on said reservation, including mixed-bloods, whether their white blood comes from the paternal or maternal side, and the children born to them, shall enjoy the undisturbed and peaceable possession of their allotted lands, and shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of the tribe enjoyed by full-blooded Indians upon the reservation; and that white men heretofore lawfully intermarried into the tribe and now living with their families upon said reservation shall have the right of residence thereon, not inconsistent with existing statutes.

"ART. V. It is understood that nothing in this agreement shall be construed to deprive the said Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, S. Dak., of any benefits to which they are entitled under existing treaties or agreements, not inconsistent with the provisions of this agreement."

SEC. 2. That the lands ceded to the United States under said agreement, excepting such tracts as may be reserved by the President, not exceeding 398.67 acres in all, for subissue station, Indian day school, one Catholic mission, and two Congregational missions, shall be disposed of under the general provisions of the homestead and town-site laws of the United States, and shall be opened to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the manner in which these lands may be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof; and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, or enter any of said lands, except as prescribed in such proclamation, until after the expiration of sixty days from the time when the same are opened to settlement and entry: Provided, That the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late civil and the Spanish wars, as defined and described in sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 1, 1901, shall not be abridged: And provided further, That the price of said lands shall be as follows: Upon all land entered or filed upon within six months after the same shall be opened for settlement and entry, $3 per acre, to be paid as follows: One dollar per acre when entry is made; 50 cents per acre within two years after entry; 50 cents per acre within three years after entry; 50 cents per acre within four years after entry, and 50 cents per acre within six months after the expiration of five years after entry. After the expiration of six months after the same shall be opened for settlement and entry the price shall be $2.50 per acre, to be paid as follows: Seventy-five cents when entry is made; 50 cents per acre within two years after entry; 50 cents per acre within three years after entry; 50 cents per acre within four years after entry, and 25 cents per acre within six months after the expiration of five years after entry: Provided, That in case any entryman fails to make such payment, or any of them, within the time stated all rights in and to the land covered by his or her entry shall at once cease, and any payments theretofore made shall be forfeited, and the entry shall be forfeited and held for cancellation: And provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent homestead settlers from commuting their entries under section 2301, Revised Statutes, by paying for the land entered the price fixed herein, receiving credit for payments previously made. In addition to the price to be paid for the land, the entryman shall pay the same fees and commissions at the time of commutation or final entry, as now provided by law, where the price of the land is $1.25 per acre: And provided further, That all lands herein ceded and opened to settlement under this act, remaining undisposed of at the expiration of four years from the taking effect of this act, shall be sold and disposed of for cash, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 3. That the proceeds received from the sale of said lands in conformity with this act shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and paid to the Rosebud Indians or expended on their account only as provided in article 3 of said agreement as herein amended.

SEC. 4. That sections 16 and 36 of the lands hereby acquired in each township shall not be subject to entry, but shall be reserved for the use of the common schools and paid for by the United States at $2.50 per acre, and the same are hereby granted to the State of South Dakota for such purpose; and in case any of said sections, or parts thereof, of the land in said county of Gregory are lost to said State of South Dakota by reason of allotments thereof to any Indian or Indians, now holding the same, or otherwise, the governor of said State, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized, in the tract herein ceded, to locate other lands not occupied, which shall be paid for by the United States as herein provided in quantity equal to the loss, and such selections shall be made prior to the opening of such lands to settlement.

SEC. 5. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $90,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for the lands granted to the State of South Dakota, as provided in section 4 of this act.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act contained shall in any manner bind the United States to purchase any portion of the land herein described, except sections 16 and 36 or the equivalent in each township, or to dispose of said land except as provided herein, or to guarantee to find purchasers for said lands or any portion thereof, it being the intention of this act that the United States shall act as trustee for said Indians to dispose of said lands and to expend and pay over the proceeds received from the sale thereof only as received, as herein provided.

During the reading of the bill Mr. FINLEY rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FINLEY. I believe that we are reading the bill. Is the bill open for amendment?

The SPEAKER. Not while it is being read. It will be open for amendment when the reading is concluded.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the opening to settlement of 416,000 acres of land, now a portion of the Rosebud Reservation, in South Dakota, being that portion of the reservation in Gregory County. In 1901 a treaty was entered into with the Rosebud Indians on the part of the United States, by which the Indians agreed to sell to the Government this land for $2.50 per acre. That treaty was transmitted to Congress, and because of the fact that it provided that the Government should pay for the lands outright and then take the chance of the Treasury being reimbursed by disposing of the lands to settlers, it never got further than through the Committee on Indian Affairs, which unanimously reported it favorably. It was never given consideration in the House.

Toward the concluding days of the last session of Congress a new bill was prepared, substantially as this bill now provides, and that bill provided that the lands should be ceded by the Indians to the Government, disposed of to settlers under the provisions of the homestead law, the price to be fixed at $2.50 an acre, as was provided in the original treaty. That bill did not receive consideration in the last Congress because of lack of time, but during the summer that bill was submitted to this tribe of Indians for their acceptance, and forty-eight more than a majority consented to accept the terms of that bill. This bill is substantially the same as the bill which I have just referred to, except that the committee, in view of a suggestion made by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in which he said he had no objection to the passage of this bill provided the Indians were insured of as much money as they would have received under the treaty, instead of fixing the price at $2.75, which was provided in the bill submitted to the Indians during the summer, fixed the price at $3 per acre for all lands taken within the first six months and $2.50 for all lands taken thereafter.

It was thought by the committee that this would certainly insure to the Indians as much money as they would have received under the original treaty, and, in my judgment, it insures their receiving considerably more. There is no opposition to the passage of this measure, so far as I know. The Indian Bureau and the Secretary of the Interior have both approved it, providing we fix a price, as we have done, that will insure the Indians as much money as they would have received under the original treaty. The Committee on Indian Affairs has considered it fully and at length and has spent several meetings of the full committee considering it. The report of the committee is unanimous. I do not care to occupy the attention of the House in making any extended remarks on the bill, and unless some gentleman desires to ask some questions I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I observe that in section 4, reserving school lands, it is provided that the Government pay for those lands. Is that the usual appropriation that is put in all bills of this character?

Mr. BURKE. I am glad the gentleman has asked me that question. I would state that under the enabling act under which the State of South Dakota was admitted to the Union it was provided that sections 16 and 36 in said State should be reserved for the use of the common schools of that State, and it further provided that as to the lands within an Indian reservation the provisions of that grant would not become operative until the reservation was extinguished and the land restored to the public domain. That enabling act was passed by Congress on the 22d day of February, 1889. In March of that same year Congress ratified a treaty with the Sioux Indians in South Dakota for the cession of something like ten or eleven millions of acres of land, and made an express appropriation, in accordance with the provisions of the enabling act, to pay outright out of the Treasury the money for sections 16 and 36 of that land at the price stipulated for in the treaty.

Mr. FINLEY. Then, as I understand the gentleman, he bases the wisdom or equity for this provision upon the enabling act admitting South Dakota into the Union?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. And not otherwise?

Mr. BURKE. No.

Mr. FINLEY. What is the number of acres of land that have been granted by the National Government to the State of South Dakota for school purposes heretofore?

Mr. BURKE. Sections 16 and 36.

Mr. FINLEY. About how many acres does it amount to?

Mr. BURKE. I could not state.

Mr. FINLEY. The State is quite rich in school lands, is it not?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. About what amount of money will be required from the Treasury of the United States to pay for the school lands provided for here in section 4?

Mr. BURKE. Not to exceed about $70,000—I think $72,000 or $73,000. I am going to ask to amend the bill by striking out "$90,000" and inserting "$75,000." The actual amount, I think, will be about $72,000, as nearly as I can calculate.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time and yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER].

Mr. BAKER. Oh, make it fifteen.

Mr. BURKE. I hope the gentleman will be satisfied with ten minutes. We want to get through the bill as quickly as possible.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I recognize that it will make little difference when the vote on this bill is taken whether I speak for five or fifteen minutes. Yet, Mr. Speaker, because this bill involves what seems to me a violation of the principle which should obtain with reference to the ownership of land, because it violates the principle which, in my judgment, should obtain in opening public land for settlement, I desire to enter my protest against the bill on those grounds.

I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, that I did not know until a few moments ago that this bill was to be discussed to-day. I should very much have liked a short time, if but an hour, to send for some data to bring to the attention of the House, so as to amplify the few remarks I shall now have to make spontaneously.

Mr. Speaker, what is it that this bill proposes to do? From the standpoint from which I shall discuss the bill we can eliminate the Indians from the discussion. I am not going to raise the question here now as to what the Indians should or should not receive. That is not the point; the point is what is to become of that land when it comes into the possession of the United States and the ownership becomes vested in the people as a whole.

The bill, as its author has just stated, simply carries out a policy which has obtained in the past. Is that not so?

Mr. BURKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. Speaker, that policy to my mind is a fatally defective policy—a policy which in a large measure is responsible for the economic conditions that exist in the United States to-day. I know that my friends on the other side will say that the economic conditions in this country were never more prosperous than they are now. Let us concede for the sake of argument that is so; that they are more prosperous than they ever were; yet that does not alter my judgment that they would have been infinitely more prosperous than they are, infinitely more prosperous than they have ever been, but for the fact that the United States have followed this fatally defective policy and have permitted the alienation of its public lands. They have permitted individuals to purchase the land, and no matter how low the price at which they bought the title the increased value which comes as the result of generations of development, generations of energy applied by the people as a result of the influx of an enormous population—aside from the natural growth—whatever the cause of the increase of value, goes into the private pocket of the individual who was fortunate enough, you say shrewd enough, quick-witted enough, or anything else you may choose to call it, to get there a little ahead of somebody else and (by original entry in many cases) obtained it for nothing or for a mere song, a price that may have been the real value at the time of the purchase, but which represents a ridiculously small proportion of the value which has subsequently attached to that land as a result of population coming there.

Now, in what particular does this policy violate what should in my judgment be the policy of the United States? It violates it in this way: It says to the individual who is shrewd enough to go there and arrives a day, a month, or a year ahead of somebody else—I care not what the period of time may be—he shall have the exclusive "ownership" of that land; he shall enjoy all the value which subsequently attaches, no matter what causes that increase of value.

In other words, you are by this and similar bills perpetuating—you are offering a premium to engage in land speculation in the United States, and land speculation is the curse of this country, as it has been the curse of every civilized country in the world.

The evil results which have followed the existing systems of entry and purchase of public lands are clearly illustrated in an article by J. L. McCreery, of this city, entitled "Our system of distributing the public lands."

In illustrating some of the fraudulent methods employed, which no doubt in the main are due to the fact that the present system offers great premiums in the shape of whatever increment of value may subsequently attach to land by reason of increase of population, etc., he says:

Let us suppose (to invent a name) that the New York and Nebraska Land and Cattle Company start in business in the far West. It has in its employ 100 "cowboys." The fertile valley of a stream is selected for its operations. At the instance of the manager of the company each of the cowboys files a preemption declaratory statement for a quarter-section (160 acres) of land. The land is selected in such a form as to cover as much space as possible up and down the stream. One man's four 40-acre in a "string" can often be made to cover a mile of the water course; sometimes not more than three-fourths of a mile. A hundred entrymen can thus take in 75 miles of the stream—the richest part of the valley.

The preemption law requires that a person purchasing land thereunder must prove that he has inhabited and improved such land. It does not say how long he must have done so. The General Land Office has supplied this omission and carried into effect what it conceives to be the spirit and purpose of the law by establishing a rule that such residence and improvement must have continued for at least six months, in order to afford a presumption that the settler is acting in good faith. So a few days after the expiration of six months from the date of the entry the cowboys, in "squads," appear at the local land office and "prove up." It is not necessary to have erected a dwelling house upon and improved the land if the entryman and his two witnesses have sufficiently elastic consciences. A has for witnesses B and C; B has for witnesses A and C; C has for witnesses A and B. The land is paid for in cash, which the company furnishes. The cowboys step over to the nearest lawyer's office, or more likely the company has its own lawyer, and deed every acre of land to the company.

Having exhausted their right under the preemption law, they forthwith proceed to enter as much more land under the homestead law. At the end of six months they pay (with money furnished by the company) for the land under the commutation provision of the homestead law, and at once transfer it to the company.

But the end is not yet. True, the preemption act and the homestead act each provides that no person shall have the benefit thereof more than once. But at this stage of the proceedings the cowboy that last year made preemption and homestead entry of certain land under the name of John Brown now makes entry of another quarter under the name of Nicholas Yost; Frank Smith becomes Theophilus Baxter; Henry Jones becomes Philip Lingenfelter; and seven months later the syndicate obtains possession of 30,000 acres more of the best land in the State.

And by and by the immigration of honest settlers begins. They push into this region only to find that all the land worth having up and down that water course for a hundred miles has passed into the hands of this land syndicate. There is, at a moderate estimate, a space of 10 miles on each side of this stream and whatever tributaries run into it—20 miles in width by a hundred miles in length, covering an area of 2,000 square miles—in which no bona fide settler can find a foot of water front.

Why do men engage in these gigantic land frauds? Is it conceivable that they would do this, that such practices would be engaged in, if the leasing system obtained, if they knew that no matter what the increase in the value of the land its annual rental would increase in like proportion? Certainly not! They do this, they are willing to blacken their own souls because of the great prizes offered them, for the possibility of a large increase in the value of the land, which at some time in the future they will be able to squeeze out of the genuine settler, the man who is really looking for a quarter section of land upon which to build a home and rear a family. Periodical appraisements at brief intervals would destroy this form of land speculation and all the fraud which attaches to it.

The methods which Mr. McCreery cites are no doubt largely responsible for the existence of enormous land holdings by companies and individuals. Every schoolboy knows the enormous increasing power of accumulated capital. As these large estates increase in size and number, the greater will be their power to absorb the smaller farms adjoining them. Our farms of 500 acres and over would now cover an area more than five times the size of the great State of Indiana, with its 2,000,000 and over inhabitants. That is to say, about 115,940 men own a vast area of about 126,000,000 acres of the best farming land in the world, and which should be divided among 10,000,000 people, and which is capable of giving support, self-employment, homes, and happiness to that vast number of people. And when we consider the further awful fact that about one-half of this vast expanse of 126,000,000 acres of land, which within the memory of men still living was parceled out by our Government to our citizens in small farms, is now at this early day absorbed by and owned by 31,546 men and corporations, the situation is still more alarming. In one of his speeches Daniel Webster once said: "A free government can not long endure where the tendency of laws is to concentrate the wealth of the country in the hands of a few, and to render the masses poor and dependent." In the light of the above facts, can there be any doubt as to the tendency of our present land laws, and that radical changes in our land laws are absolutely necessary?

The extent of many of these large estates is simply astounding, as is shown by the following list of a very few of the large land owners of this country:

	Acres.
Col. D. C. Murphy	4,068,000
Texas State Fund Association (owned by four men)	3,000,000
The Standard Oil Company	1,000,000
John W. Dwight, a farmer in North Dakota (nearly as large as Rhode Island)	704,000
Ex-Senator Dorsey	500,000
E. C. Sprague	500,000
Miller & Lux (San Francisco)	450,000
Mr. McLaughlin, of California	400,000
William A. Chapman	350,000
New York syndicate	300,000
Surveyor-General Beals	300,000
Texas Land and Cattle Company	240,000
Bixby, Flint & Co	200,000
Thomas Fowler	200,000
Abel Stearnes	200,000
The Murphy family, of California	156,000
G. W. Roberts	140,000
Virginia Coal and Iron Company	100,000

But a still more alarming feature lies in the enormous alien ownership of our land. In addition to the numerous smaller alien holdings here, fifty-six foreign persons and corporations own more than 26,000,000 acres of our land—an area equal to that of the great States of Ohio, Kentucky, or Virginia. The enormous size of some of these holdings of land in this country by foreigners may be seen by the following partial list:

	Acres.
Baron Tweeddale	1,750,000
Byron H. Evans	700,000
M. Ellerhousen	600,000
Robert Tennant	530,000
Duke of Sutherland	422,000
W. Whaley, M. D	310,000
Duke of Northumberland	191,460
Duke of Devonshire	148,625
Earl of Cleveland	106,650
Lord Dunmore	120,000
Benjamin Neugas	100,000
Earl of Carlisle	78,540
Sir W. W. Win	91,612
Duke of Rutland	70,000
Lord Houghton	60,000
Lord Dunraven	60,000
Duke of Bedford	51,085
Earl of Brownlow	57,799
Earl of Derby	56,698
Earl of Cawdor	51,538
Lord of Londonsboro	52,655
Duke of Portland	55,259
Earl of Powls	46,055
Lady Willoughby	59,312
Earl of Yarborough	54,570

And there are hundreds of smaller foreign holdings of from 500 acres up.

The ownership of our land by foreign land syndicates is also simply astounding. A Dutch syndicate owns 4,500,000 acres of our land in New Mexico and adjoining Territories. Another Dutch syndicate owns 3,000,000 acres in Texas. An English syndicate owns 1,800,000 acres in Mississippi. A Scotch syndicate owns 500,000 acres in Florida.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for me to do anything more than call attention to the foundation principle; but let me ask what has followed the violation of that principle and what should be the policy of the United States toward the few remaining million acres of land that it controls? No land should be finally alienated or given into absolute permanent private possession.

The beneficent results which would follow the adoption of the leasing policy instead of outright sale with our remaining public lands are clearly set forth in an address by Frederick S. Elder, professor of mathematics at the Oklahoma University, before the Oklahoma bar at Guthrie, January 6, from which I quote as follows:

DEFENSE OF A LEASING POLICY.

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Oklahoma Bar Association, and Citizens of Oklahoma: Two million fifty-six thousand acres is the measure of Oklahoma's present public-land endowment, and since seventeen-twentieths of this is expressly reserved for the support of education I shall feel justified in referring to the entire grant as the school lands of Oklahoma.

Eighteen months ago the lessees in Territorial convention passed and published resolutions to force the sale of these lands to themselves as "raw lands," and declared, with a vigor calculated to strike terror to the stoutest-hearted politician, "We pledge ourselves to the support of such men to the Territorial legislature as will do all in their power to bring the school lands on the market in accordance with the above resolutions." And it may be that with this threat in mind the State Capital, not without knowledge of the subtle operations of legislatures, was recently moved to cry out: "Who does not believe that they (the lessees) would control the first legislature and create a legislature that would sell the lands?"

It will be noted that those who desire to gobble Oklahoma's public lands threaten political annihilation to all who dare oppose their outright sale. It is the same old story again. Any man who dare oppose the demands of the shrewd and powerful, who insists that in the treatment of this question, as of any other question, that the interests of the whole people should determine are met with the organized opposition of those who seek to live in the sweat of other men's brows, are threatened with political annihilation if they dare assert the equal right of all men to use the earth.

Turning back a few pages of history to discover what blunders Oklahoma should avoid, we find Ohio's grant of a million and a half acres, with no constitutional protection, becoming the prize of organized plunder. One lot of 10,000 acres went into perpetual lease at 12 cents per acre. The university endowment of two townships, 46,080 acres of the choicest lands of the State, is under perpetual lease at less than 10 cents an acre, and a third township of 23,040 acres is under perpetual lease at less than 25 cents per acre. Thousands of acres were sold for 50, 25, and 10 cents per acre.

Of course, a perpetual lease is equally as bad and in effect amounts to an outright sale. What Mr. Elder contends for, and which I also contend for upon this floor, is for a lease for a brief period of years with a reappraisement in the case of such land as is involved in this bill (remote, I assume, from present civilization) every fifth year.

That this system is entirely feasible, despite the implied criticism of my friend from Iowa, is shown in the figures which Mr. Elder quotes of the income which Oklahoma has received from its public lands.

Total net income from leasing Oklahoma's public lands for fiscal years ending June 30—

1898	173,442.83
1900	177,190.24
1901	213,203.67
1902	247,603.61
1902, cash bonus above rental in western counties	188,507.24

Not a cent of this income raised by taxation but as a just equivalent for the valuable privilege of raising crops and making a living without having first to invest a fortune in a farm, and, contrary to the idea of any hardship having been worked upon the occupant, his great advantage over his land-owning neighbor is shown in the report of ex-Secretary Huston for 1902, where he says (p. 21): "Computing the interest on the value of similar lands at 7 per cent and adding the usual taxes, the investment of the landowner will be found to be two or three times the rental according to the last appraisement."

It will be noted that Mr. Elder calls the rental paid by the lessees "a just equivalent for the valuable privilege of raising crops and making a living without having first to invest a fortune in a farm." Of course he here uses the customary terminology, which shows how far we have strayed from correct principles, that even a gentleman like Mr. Elder, when advocating the leasing system, speaks of it as a "valuable privilege," because under the lease system "it is not necessary first to invest a fortune in a farm." If the lease system had obtained from the first, no such idea could have grown up. It is only because we have followed the fatal, aye wicked, policy of England and European countries, that anyone considers it a "valuable privilege" to be able to use land without first paying in as the purchase price a twenty-year capitalization of its rental value.

But perhaps the best illustration of the advantage of the leasing system is shown in his citation of the school lands of Chicago. He says:

The school lands of Illinois afford us the best illustration to be had of the surpassing advantages to the State of a system of leasing, of the manner in which a land endowment increases in value proportionately with the growth of population and of the necessity for a periodic revaluation of the land. I refer to the school lands located in the city of Chicago. The heart of the city from Madison street south to Twelfth and from State street west to Halsted was one school section, No. 16. Here is where the twelve and sixteen story buildings stand. Here you find the post-office, the Rookery, the Board of Trade, the Women's Temple, and scores of others like them. By some strange fortune hardly understood a block at State and Madison streets was reserved from sale with certain other sundry lots. These, with a few more tracts acquired later, are held to-day by the Chicago board of education and the ground rent, amounting to half a million dollars annually, is being turned into the school fund for the payment of teachers' salaries.

The leases are for fifty or a hundred years. The ground alone is leased and the lessees put up their own buildings, costing hundreds of thousands of dollars. Of these the Chicago Tribune pays $30,000 a year for one-fifth of an acre, the McVicker Theater $27,000 for thirty-six hundredths of an acre, Joseph E. Otis $25,000 for eighty-eight thousandths of an acre, this last being at the yearly rate of $289,115 per acre, and so on for others. Yet nobody is wronged. It is a plain business proposition. No sane man pays more rent than he ought.

Neither is the community nor any individual wronged any more by the payment by the Chicago Tribune of $30,000 into the school board treasury than by the payment by the Women's Temple Company of $40,000 a year into the private pocket of Mr. Marshall Field for the use of lots that were once a part of that same original section 16.

How fatally defective the sale policy has been is clearly illustrated in two of the cases he cites, namely, the payment by the Chicago Tribune of $30,000 into the school board treasury and the payment by the Woman's Temple Company of $40,000 a year into the private pocket of Mr. Marshall Field. When Mr. Field uses a part of the immense income which he is deriving from his ownership of a part of the original school lands of Chicago and builds a library therewith, we are invited to laud him as a public-spirited citizen. How much better it would have been for that city if, instead of alienating the larger part of its school lands, it had retained the unearned increment by leasing them, as in the case of the land beneath the Rookery and the Chicago Tribune buildings. If this had been done Chicago would not have to wait upon the "philanthropy" of any of its citizens, but would have an ever-increasing fund, which it could apply not merely to the erection of libraries and for the maintenance of its schools, but for every other communal purpose. Of course, it would not then have these ostentatious gifts of libraries or museums, but neither would it have its fearful contrasts which are directly due and are inseparable from this system of alienating the public lands, viz, the existence on the one hand of the multimillionaire and on the other of hundreds of thousands who are practically paupers.

Even South Dakota has 1,531,900 acres of land under lease, or nearly four times the amount involved in this bill, so that I am warranted in assuming that the leasing system possesses no insuperable obstacles and is workable even in that State.

One of the most vivid illustrations of the result which follows the outright sale of public lands is cited by Mr. Elder in the case of the school lands in Blair County, Tex., which were sold at $3 an acre on forty years' time at 4 per cent, now yielding the State of Texas 12 cents per acre, while the present owners are able to pocket the difference between 12 cents and three to four dollars per acre which they secure as rental from sublessees.

That the present system results in the creation of a large number of tenant farmers the census report clearly shows, but whereas the leasing system would result in the people, as a whole, obtaining the benefit of whatever increment of value might attach to these public lands as a result of increase of population, improvements in government, increase of transportation facilities, or from any other cause, the existing system results in this increment of value going into private pockets and in the building up of great private fortunes.

The census reports show in these agricultural States the following percentage of tenant farms:

State.	1880.	1890.	1900.
Ohio	19.3	22.9	27.5
Indiana	23.7	25.4	28.6
Illinois	31.4	34.0	39.3
Iowa	23.8	28.1	34.9
Kansas	16.3	28.2	35.2
Nebraska	18.0	24.7	36.9
Georgia	44.0	53.5	50.9
Alabama	46.8	48.6	57.7
Mississippi	43.8	52.8	62.4
Louisiana	35.2	44.4	58.0
Texas	37.6	41.9	45.7
Entire United States	25.6	28.4	35.3

More than one farm in three throughout the entire United States is a tenant farm.

As Mr. Elder well says, the Territory in which he lives, Oklahoma, will not avoid a tenant system by selling its land. It is rather a question as to who shall be the landlord and to whom shall be paid the ever-augmented rent which increase of population, etc., creates, whether it shall be paid to a State or Territory or to private individuals.

Mr. Speaker, by this bill you say to the individual, as has been said for generations in the past, that he who is smart enough, cunning enough, or shrewd enough to forestall the possible development of that community shall reap the enormous advantage that comes thereby; but that is not all. That is bad enough. It is bad enough that by such a policy you create the Astors, for instance, who are now receiving an annual rental value from land in the city of New York a hundred times in excess of the purchase price that John Jacob Astor paid for that land.

It is bad enough that by this act you are creating millionaires and multimillionaires, because I want to say that, with very few exceptions, such as tariff bounties and patents, you can trace the enormous wealth of the plutocrats of this country to the fact that they have been permitted to monopolize extremely valuable lands. It is not alone the land in the great cities that is valuable and that creates millionaires, but these narrow strips of land which are called rights of way, running from New York to Buffalo, New York to Chicago and San Francisco, New York to New Orleans, from Chicago to New Orleans, and everywhere else over this country, these rights of way monopolized by private individuals are extremely valuable and are the basis upon which the enormous capitalizations of the great railroads are founded. The enormous mass of "water" in their securities simply represents legalized power to exact tribute from the people and creates the millionaire and the multimillionaire in the United States, as it has created the millionaire in every other country in the world.

WATER IN RAILROAD STOCKS.

How large a proportion of the stocks and bonds of the railroads of the United States is water—i. e., represents no tangible assets, but merely the capitalization of tribute—is indicated in the statement made to me on more than one occasion by a gentleman who was one of the great railroad lawyers of the country, Thomas G. Shearman, who had not only been attorney for some of the great railroad systems—among others, for James J. Hill, of the Great Northern—but at the time of his death was counsel of that great Rockefeller institution, the National City Bank. Mr. Shearman repeatedly said, "that neither the preferred nor the common stock of the railroads of this country represented any actual investment of capital (if we exclude money paid and stock issued to legislators—not legislatures—for their franchises), but that the railroads as a whole had not originally cost to exceed 85 per cent of the par of the bonds; that from 25 to 50 per cent of the preferred was issued as an extra inducement to the bankers who bought the bonds, and that the balance of the preferred and practically all of the common stock was divided between the promoters of the railroad, the legislators, and the intermediaries who secured the franchises.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what should be the policy of the United States? The policy of the United States should be to lease these lands and all other lands which it owns; to lease them for short periods of years, and at the end of such short period let there be another leasing, giving to the Government whatever increment of value has attached to those lands by reason of the increase of population that has taken place in the meantime, by reason of the increase of invention, by the improvements of government, or anything else. For you must remember that there is no invention, there is no improvement of government, fire, police, or anything else, there is no increase of population, but what adds to the value of land. The policy of the Government, as I say, should be to lease the land for brief periods, and at the end of those periods of lease the land should be reappraised and men should be permitted to bid, and if some one else beside the owner of the improvements gets the land of course he would be recompensed the full value of the improvements.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask my friend how many orchards, he thinks, would be set out in Dakota and Iowa if a man had a three years' lease on the land and the chance of somebody else taking it away from him at the end of that time?

Mr. BAKER. I will answer the gentleman from Iowa by saying that I have said nothing whatever about the length of the period of lease. My own judgment, however, is that it ought not to be more than five years. Therefore, I will meet his question. Let me say to the gentleman that if the owners of the land are assured, as they will be, that they shall have the preference of opportunity to secure the new lease, there will be no difficulty. And I will say that the people of the United States are not going to pass any law interfering with the present system of land tenure that does not to a very large extent favor the men who are in possession of the land. Why, the whole system has been to favor those men in the past.

My friend from Iowa asks "how many orchards would be set out in Dakota and Iowa if a man had a three years' lease on the land and the chances of somebody else taking it away from him at the end of that time."

I do not imagine that the people of Iowa or South Dakota are much different from those of Illinois. In the latter State one man, really an alien, Lord William Scully, of London, owns from fifty to sixty thousand acres of the best farming land there. We are told "that he rents it at the highest cash rental, requires the tenants to build their own houses, barns, etc., and until the State prohibited it they had to pay the taxes on the land. Since then he has added the tax to the rent." From his tenants he receives about $150,000 per annum for the privilege of merely existing on his soil.

This shows not merely that men will rent land, but that they are doing so on a large scale from private individuals, and I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to this, for here they not merely lay out their own orchards, but they build their own houses, barns, etc., upon this rented land. And they are compelled to do so because of the policy which is perpetuated in this bill under which individuals are encouraged to engage in land speculation on a gigantic scale.

They are encouraged, aye, almost invited, to engage in the shameful practices I have referred to. Because of the tremendous prizes which this system offers, fraud, robbery, and sometimes arson are engaged in. Any and all means are adopted by the shrewd, cunning, and unscrupulous, who are frequently even in these cases the rich and the powerful, to get title to immense tracts of the public land, not for occupancy and use, but to withhold from use, for the more land thus withheld the greater premium these men can squeeze out of the real settlers either in original purchase price or in annual rentals. That even the possession of great wealth does not deter men from engaging in such practices is shown in the decisions of the General Land Office, volume 12, January 1 to June 30, 1891, which, on page 34, recites:

That during the month of April, 1877, 151 desert-land entries were filed in that (Visalia, Cal.) land office, covering 34,978 acres, which at once passed into the hands of Mr. J. B. Haggin, and for which he paid to the receiver $8,744.45. Haggin's claim was that he had loaned money to these 151 entrymen, and that they had assigned to him their "final certificates."

What the present value of these 35,000 acres of land may be I have no means of knowing, but it is quite possible that their ownership thus obviously fraudulently acquired is the basis of at least one of the millions he is reputed to possess.

Time and time again we are told that perpetual ownership of the fee is absolutely essential to induce men to cultivate the land. It is constantly asserted that unless the land is sold for all time the occupier will not improve it; that, according to the inference of the query of my friend from Iowa, no one will plant orchards thereon. This, in the face of the fact that for over three hundred years the leasing policy—the policy of paying the royalty for the use of the land into the public treasury instead of into private pockets—obtains in Freudenstadt, Germany, as set forth in an article by Henry Labouchere in his paper, the London Truth. He says:

For instance, there is Freudenstadt, a hamlet in the valley among the Alps in the southwestern part of the German Empire, 45 miles of Stuttgart. That region has been favored with but few natural resources; but between three and four hundred years ago an old monk got the notion into his head that, while whatever a man produced by his labor might belong to him individually, whatever natural wealth or resources were found in a given region belonged equally to all the members of the community inhabiting that region. This theory and practice has been pursued ever since. In this region are some pits of valuable fire clay, which the people dig and pile up for purchasers. The men who do the digging receive day's wages; but when the clay is sold the pay for the clay itself—what is called "royalty"—goes into the treasury. Upon the hillsides is some surplus timber. The men who cut down and pile up the timber are paid day's wages; when the timber is sold its value as it stood uncut upon the stump—in short, the "stumpage"—goes into the treasury.

What a pity a few thousand such monks, intelligent in economics, did not come to this country instead of the William Penns who transplanted here the English system of selling the land.

The income from these sources pays their share of the tax levied for the support of the German Empire, pays all their own officials, builds their schoolhouses and pays their teachers, builds their churches and pays their priests. The people have not been taxed a cent in three hundred and fifty years. Their income always exceeds their expenditures. In 1882 this surplus was divided among the inhabitants per capita, each man, woman, and child receiving (in terms of our money) $13.35. The amount distributed in 1888 would have been $16.55, but the citizens voted to apply it to building waterworks.

The folly of the present system of permanently alienating the land is clearly set forth in Mr. McCreery's article, from which I quote:

The refusal of the Government to use for its own support the rental value of its ordinary land, the royalty of its minerals, the stumpage of its timber, etc., renders it necessary to pass other laws most oppressive, unrighteous, and demoralizing. The tariff laws, inciting to smuggling, provoking perjury in undervaluation, and when honestly enforced woefully discriminating against the poor man. Internal-revenue laws, inducing the making of "moonshine" whisky, the murder of revenue officers, and other forms of lawlessness.

But when I ask the average farmer, "Would you not like such a change in the tax laws as would relieve you of one-half the tax you are now paying, and place it on the shoulders of the land speculators, the mine owners, the timber syndicates, the oil companies, and others who are now enriching themselves by monopolizing the bounties of nature?" he answers, "The old plan, by which I and my ancestors have been fleeced in the past, is good enough for me." When I ask the average laborer, "Would you not like a system of taxation that would furnish employment to a million more workingmen than can now find employment [half a million in the cities and another half a million in the country] and raise the wages of all?" he turns upon me with a sneer and says, "You are a crank and an anarchist. Go hence!"

I could very well afford to go, for while the farmer and the workingman are paying twice the tax they need to they are also paying at least half of mine. But alas! this is not merely a question as to which shall pay his own or the other's tax, but one of honesty or morality and national welfare. Aside from the fact that our system of land laws opens invitingly wide the door to gigantic frauds upon the Government and upon individuals and offers an enormous premium on perjury, their effect, even when enforced in strict accordance with the intent of the legislative power that enacted them, is conspicuously pernicious.

He says:

If it be demoralizing to train a nation to become a set of liars when confronted by tax assessors or custom-house officers; if it be demoralizing to educate the young to the idea that labor is degrading and that the most respectable and honorable thing in life is to enrich one's self by being a parasite upon one's fellow-creatures; if it be demoralizing for the Government not only to throw away its richest treasures, but to do so upon a lottery plan which encourages gambling and a horde of kindred vices; if it be demoralizing to increase the number of the landless multitude who have no stake in the welfare of our nation; if it is demoralizing to have a million idle men among us, necessitating a "slum" ward in every city and a great army of tramps traversing the country, then I have proved the proposition that, in addition to being the prolific parent of fraud and perjury, our land laws, even when honestly and faithfully administered, are a source of widespread and woeful demoralization.

You say, if you do not permit private ownership, there will be no security of tenure; there will be no inducement for people to go on and improve their land. To any man who cares to make that statement upon this floor I wish to say that some of the greatest buildings in the city of New York are situated upon leased land—that some of the most valuable buildings in the city of New York have been erected upon leased land, upon land owned by the Sailors' Snug Harbor corporation, land that for generations has been leased from time to time. The entire usufruct of that land goes to that private corporation—the Sailors' Snug Harbor—and does not go to the men who own the buildings, who use the buildings, and carry on great mercantile affairs. Yet you will say that it is necessary that there shall be permanent private ownership of land before men will engage in business enterprises.

Mr. Speaker, go into any one of the large cities of the United States, and what will you find? You will find hundreds of thousands of individuals congregated in such a small area that it is scarcely possible for them to breathe separately. The crowded condition of New York City, the crowded condition of Chicago, the noisome slums that exist in those and other cities and that also exist right here in the capital of the United States, are directly due to this policy of encouraging people to withhold land from use, so that they may be able to exact an ever-increasing tribute from those who subsequently use it, after paying a brigand's ransom for it.

I have said that the existence of slums in our great cities is directly traceable to the policy which is continued in this bill of selling the public lands outright. This policy of outright sale, together with the policy of assessing unused land at but a fraction of its value, creates overcrowding—that is, the slums—and which has been recently shown to exist right here in Washington to an alarming degree. To what extent land speculation is encouraged in the District of Columbia by this foolish policy of almost entirely exempting unused land from taxation is shown in the case of Paul T. Bowen, who in January, 1896, then being a clerk in the Treasury Department, purchased 2.3 acres of land in the northwestern part of the District, near Chevy Chase, for $1,840. When he bought it it was assessed at $225 an acre. The following year the assessment was reduced to $200 an acre as "agricultural" land at $1 on the $100, and was continued at that rate until January, 1901, when he sold the land for $5,000, making a net profit of $3,137—170 per cent—in five years. This land sold for about $2,200 an acre and was assessed at $200 an acre—about one-eleventh of its value. I suppose the assessors assessed it as "agricultural land" so as to help the farming industry.

The following from the Washington Post gives but one illustration of the results that follow this encouragement to land speculation:

[Washington Post, January 8, 1902.]

The object of the resolution, argued Mr. M. I. Weller, was to provide for an equalization of taxation and proper valuation of those parcels of land held for speculative purposes. The Government recently acquired for $5,000 a plot containing 7¼ acres from a tract of 250 acres. The portion bought by the Government was about one-thirtieth of the whole, and the entire property was valued by the assessors at $85,000. The actual valuation of the tract was about $1,200,000, and in the opinion of real estate men the price paid by the Government was by no means high. Another instance of the same kind, though more startling, was shown by Mr. Weller. The Government, he declared, recently acquired another piece of property beyond the city limits, for which $25,000 was paid. He had the curiosity to look up the valuation on the assessment books and found it to be $1,400—less than 6 per cent of the amount the Government paid for it.

One of the disastrous effects which have followed our adoption of the English land system, which is perpetuated in this bill, is set forth in an editorial paragraph in a recent issue of the Public, a paper which I stated on a previous occasion discusses current affairs in a manner that can not help but clarify the thought of those who read its editorials:

How American sympathy went out to the evicted Irish some years ago, when as many as 3,000 families were turned out of their houses for nonpayment of rent! But 60,463 families were evicted in the city of New York, Manhattan Borough alone, during the year 1903 without exciting special wonder. Yet where is the difference? Apparently the only difference is in the fact that New York evictions last year were about twenty times as many as in the worst year of Irish evictions. In proportion to population the disparity is much greater. Whereas the Irish evictions of the heaviest year numbered about 1 to every 1,300 of population, those of New York numbered about 1 to every 35 of population.

Doesn't this constitute an indictment of the present system of selling the public land, thus encouraging land speculation, which has produced the same evils here as have afflicted Ireland for generations?

I have said that our policy of permanently alienating the public lands was copied from England. That is true. I wish I could say it is also true that this country is ready to follow England in a change in this very policy which she seems to be on the eve of making, or at least which she gives unmistakable signs of being likely to do in the near future. My Republican friends some five years ago suddenly became such great admirers of England and the policy of territorial aggrandizement of her Tory ministers that they "benevolently assimilated" the Filipinos. Recently they have been even more warm in their expressions of admiration for Joseph Chamberlain's cynical, retrograde policy. No more are we told that it is necessary to twist the British lion's tail on every occasion that offers; on the contrary, our American Tories even seemed to be about to invite that renegade radical, Chamberlain, who is out-Torying the Tories, to come over here and take charge of the rapidly approaching campaign for "protection and plutocracy"—I beg pardon, for "protection and labor."

I admit that their pro-Chamberlain ardor has apparently somewhat cooled with the English election returns of the past six weeks. With constituency after constituency, rural as well as urban, recording themselves against a reimposition of the corn laws or any other form of protection, our Republican friends are probably not quite so sanguine of what will come out of a British general election.

While it is gratifying to observe that Chamberlain is not succeeding in his attempt to hoodwink the British workingman into believing that he can lift himself up by his boot straps—that he can tax himself rich, that a tax upon foodstuffs will benefit him—it is even more gratifying to observe that the Liberal party there, the prototype of the Democratic party here, is not content to meet Mr. Chamberlain with the mere negative proposition of "leaving well enough alone," nor to emulate MARK HANNA in his "stand-pat" policy, but are rather showing an unmistakable disposition to go to the root of the matter.

One of the great London magazines, the Contemporary Review, has in its January number an article entitled "The need of a Radical party." If written for American consumption, I suppose it would have called it "The need of a radical Democratic party."

This article, in describing what is needed to combat and successfully overthrow the revival of protection, says:

[From Contemporary Review for January.]

There remains the condition of a great question which will fire men's imaginations with the feeling of a distinct and vital need. Can there be any doubt that the land question answers to this description? "Man is a land animal," says Henry George, and in England man and the land are parted. It is not surprising, therefore, that not one, but a thousand currents of thought flow into this channel. What, for example, is the one solid feature of the national economy which gives force to the revival of protection? The decline of agriculture, the fact that a yearly decreasing body of Englishmen live and work on the soil, and a yearly decreasing proportion of food is raised on English land. From 1851 to 1891 the number of agricultural laborers has declined 36 per cent; during the ensuing ten years a further decline of 25 per cent has taken place, while in fatal testimony to the tendency to make land the sporting ground of the rich rather than the patrimony of the entire people, the number of gamekeepers has increased 25 per cent in the same period. Is it possible to state a fact of greater social significance?

It may be profitable to ask right here why the number of English agricultural laborers has declined 52 per cent in fifty years, while gamekeepers have increased 25 per cent during that period. The answer is not hard to find. It is found in a system of taxation in England, as here, which places nearly all the burden of local taxation upon improvements and upon personal property, while land values almost escape taxation. Let England but reverse this policy. Let her exempt improvements and other forms of labor products from taxation and place the burden of taxation where it naturally belongs—on land values—and her dukes, marquises, and earls will no longer find it profitable to breed rabbits and foxes. The land will then be cultivated, and farm laborers will not need to immigrate here or to Canada to look for employment. It is land monopoly, made possible because land is not taxed according to its value, that drives the farm laborer from the country of his birth, while gamekeepers are employed to drive his fellow off of "my lord's" land. Our policy of selling the public lands and then placing the burden of taxation upon the settlers' improvements, while the land speculator almost entirely escapes, is producing in America the same evils.

The writer goes on to describe further the desertion of English fields and the degradation of the landless laborers, and asks: "What are the remedies?" He answers:

Not the discredited device of protection, which the laborers will not have at any price, but the reform of our land system, for that system furnishes the most effective bar to the application of the wonderful discovery that the old Malthusian specter of the pressure of population on the means of subsistence is laid forever, and that, as Prince Kropotkin shows, the land of England could sustain out of its own resources not merely the foreign-fed multitudes of to-day, but double and treble that number.

The writer continues:

Municipalities, distracted with the growing burden of improvements, the increasing difficulties of traction and urban extension, the appalling evils of overcrowding, are rapidly coming to Mr. Booth's conclusion that the taxation of ground values lies at the root of the housing problem.

As it is inevitable that we in this country must ultimately conclude.

The article then shows the reasonableness of this method of taxation and violently attacks Mr. Chamberlain's proposals, calling them a "monstrous piece of economic atavism"—an attempt to shift more and more of the burdens of the state upon industry and wages.

The conclusion of the author is that "the land question is ripe for action."

The Contemporary Review is not alone in pointing to the taxation of land values (in England sometimes termed the "taxation of site values," at other times "taxation of ground rents") as the policy which the Liberal party must adopt to successfully and completely defeat Chamberlain's protectionist propaganda. for the London Speaker, the leading Liberal weekly, in its editorial of January 9, says:

We have to attack not merely the false remedies the protectionists are offering us, but the real abuses and injustices they are defending.

It proceeds:

For this reason we are delighted to notice the emphasis laid by the Independent Review on the necessity of land reform, a subject which occupies two articles in the January number of that periodical. The first article, presumably from the pen of the editor, destroys in a terse and luminous retrospect the historical defenses for land monopoly; the second, written by Mr. Charles Trevelyan, sets out some of the arguments for the taxation of land values. Our own strong opinions in favor of treating this question as one of immediate urgency have been expressed often enough in these columns.

The Speaker urges the Liberal party to grapple fearlessly with the land problem, and says "the case for action is unusually strong."

Mr. Chamberlain proposes to increase the price of food without relieving at all the pressure of rent, and if the Liberal party can not offer the country some real measure of reform its place in the scheme of progress is forfeited. We hope, then, that there will be no hesitation in the Liberal party about grappling with this problem in its various aspects, for the land question is just as important in the country as in the town.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to one section of the bill.

Mr. BURKE. I do not think it would be in order to offer an amendment. I can not accept it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to an hour, and after the expiration of that time the bill is open to amendment, unless the previous question operates.

Mr. BURKE. Well, I do not yield to an amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that I am in favor of the bill. I believe it is correct in its policy. I believe that these reservations should be opened up, but I do not believe in the provision of the bill that provides that after the four years' time has elapsed that the remaining portion of the unsold land should be sold in unlimited quantities under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. I desire to offer an amendment providing that the amount sold to any one man shall not exceed 640 acres. I would limit it to 160 acres if it were agricultural land, but I presume all the agricultural land will have been taken within the four years and that there will be no agricultural land to be taken up.

Mr. BURKE. Does the gentleman want to limit the amount to 640 acres?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; to 640 acres.

Mr. BURKE. Is that all that the amendment provides?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is all that part of the amendment provides.

Mr. BURKE. I do not object to that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is another amendment which I think should be made to this bill. If there were valuable minerals in this land the minerals should not pass with the land and be subject to entry. I believe that the miners are entitled to as much consideration as the homesteader.

Mr. BURKE. There is a general law that protects that.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state to the gentleman from South Dakota that he is recognized for an hour.

Mr. BURKE. I understand that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. And that the bill is subject to amendment unless the gentleman at the end of that time asks the previous question.

Mr. BURKE. I stated that I had no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, to limit it as he states, and after the disposition of that I shall ask for the previous question upon the bill and amendments to its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from South Dakota that the Chair understands the rule to be this: In the hour that the gentleman controls the bill is not subject to amendment, and that so far the amendments have been read for information. Now, if the gentleman yields the floor the bill will be subject to amendment.

Mr. BURKE. I am not yielding the floor, Mr. Speaker, and I ask for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is asked for.

Mr. BAKER. I shall object, Mr. Speaker, unless I can have an opportunity to offer my amendment.

Mr. BURKE. I ask that the bill be amended as suggested by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent——

Mr. BAKER. I object, Mr. Speaker, unless I can have an opportunity to offer my amendment. You can vote my amendment down in a second.

Mr. BURKE. Do I understand that the amendments of the committee are now considered as pending?

The SPEAKER. The amendments reported from the committee are pending. The gentleman from South Dakota can offer an amendment if he sees proper, and then call the previous question. He can test the sense of the House at any time he desires.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "interior," in line 12, page 10 of the bill, insert the words "not more than 640 acres to any one purchaser."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That covers the ground of my amendment.

On motion of Mr. BURKE, the previous question was ordered.

The question was taken on the amendment and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand I can not now offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The previous question is now operating.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FINLEY. Merely for a matter of information. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from South Dakota to his proposition to amend the amount of appropriation by reducing it from $90,000 to $75,000.

Mr. BURKE. I am going to offer that at the proper time. I move to amend, Mr. Speaker, in section 5, in line 10, to strike out the word "ninety" and insert "seventy-five."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAKER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. FINLEY. I move to recommit the bill with instruction to report back a reduced appropriation from $90,000 to $75,000, in line 10, page 11.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina moves to recommit the bill with instructions to the committee to report the same back immediately with an amendment, striking out the word "ninety" and inserting the word "seventy-five" in line 10, page 11; so as to make the appropriation $75,000 instead of $90,000.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. What will be the status of the bill if the gentleman's motion prevails?

The SPEAKER. It will have to be reported back by the committee forthwith if this motion is adopted.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I report back the bill H. R. 10418 with an amendment, in accordance with the direction of the House.

Mr. BAKER. A parliamentary inquiry. Has the committee had a meeting?

Mr. BURKE. I now ask the previous question on the bill and the amendments to its passage.

Mr. BAKER. You can not——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Chair is informed, and his recollection without the information concurs with the information, that this is the usual proceeding and that there are precedents. The Clerk will read section 1022 of Hinds's Parliamentary Practice.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1022. A bill may be recommitted with instructions that it be reported back forthwith, and this report may be made at once by the chairman of the committee and is not subject to the point that it must be considered in the Committee of the Whole if it has previously been considered there.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I now ask the previous question on the passage of the bill and the amendments.

Mr. BAKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Do I understand that under the rules it is not necessary for the committee to meet when the bill was recommitted?

The SPEAKER. Such has been the practice with such instructions.

Mr. BAKER. All right; I want to get that clear. Now I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment. The fate of that amendment is known. Probably there will not be another vote for it in this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAKER) the ayes were 110 and the noes 1.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may be permitted to offer his amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER. I withdraw my point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may offer an amendment.

Mr. MACON. I object.

Mr. BAKER. I raise the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PAYNE. Evidently, Mr. Speaker, there is no quorum, and we can vote on this Monday morning to accommodate my friend from New York. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending that, the Chair will submit the following personal request:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BADGER indefinitely, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion of Mr. PAYNE was then agreed to.

Accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the president of the Capital Traction Company, submitting a statement of the receipts and disbursements for the year ended December 31, 1903—to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Samuel B. Harris against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Postmaster-General, submitting a reply to the House as to the use of horses and vehicles in his Department—to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting an estimate of appropriation for reimbursement of the owners of the tug Hustler—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HENRY of Texas, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10145) to provide for appeals, writs of error, and other appellate proceedings from the circuit and district courts of Beaumont, in the eastern district of Texas, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 644); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5498) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Albany, Ga., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 645); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of bills of the following titles; which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10993) granting a pension to Mary McEvoy—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 11165) granting a pension to Thompson F. Frisbee—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 1966) for the judicial ascertainment of claims against the United States—Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SCUDDER: A bill (H. R. 11435) to establish a permanent military camp ground in Suffolk County, Long Island, in the State of New York—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CANDLER: A bill (H. R. 11436) to extend the limits of the Shiloh National Military Park and to provide for the improvement thereof—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 11437) to regulate shipping in trade between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. McCARTHY: A bill (H. R. 11438) for the purchase of site and erection of a public building in the city of Wayne, Nebr.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. ADAMSON: A bill (H. R. 11439) to authorize district judges to appoint the chief bailiffs, and fixing salaries—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11440) to provide for transfer of civil and criminal cases from one division to another in the northern district of Georgia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11441) to designate certain counties as the Atlanta division of the northern judicial district of Georgia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also (by request), a bill (H. R. 11442) to authorize district judges to order certain officers from one division to another—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 11443) to extend the exemption from head tax to citizens of Newfoundland entering the United States—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. DICK: A bill (H. R. 11444) to grant certain lands to the State of Ohio—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11445) to increase the pensions of those who have lost an eye or the sight of an eye in the military or naval service of the United States—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 1, 1904.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

Mr. CHARLES H. DIETRICH, a Senator from the State of Nebraska, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last, when, on request of Mr. HANSBROUGH, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will stand approved.

SOLDIERS' HOME AT MARION, IND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, Marion Branch, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, $5,000; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BOARD FOR PROMOTION OF RIFLE PRACTICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for the service for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1903, for expenses of Board for Promotion of Rifle Practice, $850; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF CAPITAL TRACTION COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Capital Traction Company for the year 1903; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

JOURNALS OF CONFEDERATE STATES CONGRESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 28th ultimo, a copy of the Journals of the Provisional and the First and Second Congresses of the Confederate States of America, now in the custody of the War Department.

The papers comprise about seven octavo volumes, and, if there be no objection, the Chair will refer them to the Committee on Printing without any order in reference to the printing, leaving the Committee on Printing to determine what shall be done.

Mr. BATE. I think that course will be agreeable.

Mr. BACON. Is it a recommendation of the Secretary of War?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; a communication from the Secretary of War.

Mr. BACON. What is the purport of the communication?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It transmits the Journals of the Provisional and the First and Second Congresses of the Confederate States.

Mr. BACON. I understand, but I wish to know what is the purpose of the transmission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers were transmitted in order that they might be printed.

Mr. HALE. I think it is in reply to some resolution adopted by the Senate asking the Secretary of War to send in these papers.

Mr. BACON. That is what I wished to know.

Mr. HALE. It is a matter of historic value, and if it goes to the Committee on Printing they will report as to the printing.

Mr. BATE. Let it be printed and lie on the table, please.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are seven octavo volumes.

Mr. BATE. Oh, no; just the communication from the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be printed and referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FORAKER subsequently said: Mr. President, I understand that while I was absent from the Senate for a few minutes the Chair laid before the Senate the papers transmitted by the Secretary of War in response to a Senate resolution adopted on the 28th ultimo, calling for a copy of the Journals of the Provisional and the First and Second Congresses of the Confederate States of America, and that they were referred by the Chair to the Committee on Printing.

I ask that that reference may be reconsidered and that the papers may be printed as a Senate document. I think there will be no controversy as to the propriety of printing the document. It is something which has been prepared by the War Department at a very great expense of time and trouble.

Mr. BATE. I think that is all we desire on this side about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And without any further order in relation to the printing?

Mr. FORAKER. I understand that it is not necessary to make any order under the rule. It is a document prepared by the War Department, called for by the Senate, and transmitted to the Senate in response to a resolution adopted by the Senate. The document is one entirely proper to be printed and the purpose in asking for it was to have it printed. So I——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What the Chair was asking was as to the future in addition to the number to be printed under that order, and as to how many additional copies the Senator would desire to have printed? There is a limit fixed by the rule to the number that can be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. FORAKER. Let it be printed as a Senate document. Then, after we have had a chance to look at it, if we want to have additional copies we can adopt a resolution providing for the printing of additional copies for the use of the Senate and also for the use of the House.

Mr. BATE. For the present I think that is the correct course.

Mr. ALDRICH. What are the papers?

Mr. FORAKER. Copies of the Journals of the Provisional and the First and Second Congresses of the Confederate States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is that the document which the Chair stated is in seven octavo volumes?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me that some committee ought to look at it before it is ordered printed. Does the rule apply to this document that if the printing exceeds the cost of $500 the question shall be referred to the Committee on Printing?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not. When the request is made that it be printed as a Senate document there is no limit as to the cost.

Mr. FORAKER. It is the same as in the case of any other Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The same as in the case of any other Senate document.

Mr. FORAKER. It is a document prepared by the War Department; it comes under the rule, and it is one, I think, the public will be interested in seeing.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am quite clear in the opinion that this will be a document of much interest to Congress and to the people of the country, and yet it is a fact that one of the most striking and startling extravagances of Congress is in the matter of printing. Our homes and our committee rooms are filled with books and documents that are never consulted. I wish that there might be some way devised whereby we could economize somewhat in the item of printing.

So far as this particular document is concerned, I shall be very glad indeed to have a copy of it, and if the Senator from Ohio is clear in the opinion that it ought to be printed, of course I shall interpose no objection.

Mr. FORAKER. I feel that way about it. It has been prepared under the supervision of the War Department, and it belongs to the history of the country. I think it ought to be printed.

Mr. BATE. I ask if this is the same document that was presented a while ago and went over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the same. It was referred to the Committee on Printing without an order to print.

Mr. BATE. So I understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks that that reference may be reconsidered and that it may be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. BATE. Does the Senator from Ohio indicate the number of copies that shall be printed?

Mr. FORAKER. No; I simply ask that the usual number of copies may be printed—that is quite a considerable number—and after it is in document form and we have had a chance to look at it we can provide for the printing of further copies, whatever number may be necessary.

Mr. BATE. I think the first printing should be as suggested and then we can provide afterwards for additional copies if necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio to reconsider the vote by which the document was referred to the Committee on Printing? The Chair hears none. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Onio that the papers be printed as a Senate document? The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

Does the Senator, after it is printed as a document, desire any reference of it?

Mr. FORAKER. No; I do not suppose any reference is necessary. It will be printed simply as a Senate document and will be distributed among Senators, each one having his allotment, as all other Senate documents are distributed.

ENGINEER CORPS OF THE ARMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a General Staff report relating to the increase of the Engineer Corps of the Army, together with a draft of a proposed bill on that subject; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RECESS APPOINTMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 26th ultimo, certain information relative to recess appointments of Army officers; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. TILLMAN subsequently said: I have examined the papers sent by the Secretary of War in answer to the Senate resolution, and in order to facilitate the understanding of their contents by the members of the Senate in the morning before they come here, I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD as well as printed as a document. Otherwise Senators could not see them or get hold of them until they came to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the papers to which he refers may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. What is the document?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is the answer of the Secretary of War to the resolution of the Senate in regard to the appointment of certain officers, and my sole purpose in asking that it may be printed in the RECORD is that Senators may see it in the morning, which otherwise they would not have an opportunity of doing. It has already been ordered printed as a document.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it a very long document?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not a long document, sir. I have examined it, and it will not take two pages of the RECORD.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall not object then, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and the document referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The papers referred to are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 29, 1904.

To the Senate:

I have the honor to reply to the following resolution of the Senate passed January 26, 1904:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed to send to the Senate information in the nature of answers to the following questions:

"First. What officers in the Army were appointed during the recess of the Senate occurring between March 19, 1903, to November 9, 1903? Were commissions issued these officers; and if so, of what character? What officers failed of confirmation during the special session beginning November 9 and ending December 7, 1903? Have these officers been reappointed, and have commissions been issued to them? If so, what is the character of the commission and what authority of law is there for its being issued?"

(1) A list of the officers in the Army appointed during the recess of the Senate occurring between March 19, 1903, and November 9, 1903, is annexed hereto, marked "A."

The customary recess commissions were issued to these officers, in terms expiring at the end of the next session of the Senate.

(2) The only information which the Secretary of War has as to what officers have failed of confirmation is derived from the Senate. By comparing the list of nominations sent to the Senate with the list of confirmations communicated by the Senate to the President it appears that the officers named in Schedule B, annexed hereto, had not been confirmed at noon on the first Monday of December, 1903.

(3) All the officers specified in Schedule B have been reappointed, and recess commissions, of the character specified above, have been issued to them. It is the understanding of this Department that the authority of law therefor is Article II, section 2, paragraph 3, of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

"The President shall have power to fill all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

[Three inclosures.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
Washington, January 27, 1904.

Respectfully returned to the Chief of Staff with the following information, called for by the within resolution of the Senate of January 26, 1904:

First. A list of officers in the Army appointed during the recess of the Senate occurring between March 19 and November 9, 1903. The names of all officers of the Army appointed during the recess specified is, with only two exceptions, correctly given in the list of Executive nominations received by the Senate November 11, 1903, and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date. The list thus published is inclosed to save the time of transcribing all the names.

The two officers receiving recess appointments whose names do not appear in this list are Second Lieut. F. E. Gignoux, Artillery Corps, promoted to grade of first lieutenant, and who resigned during the recess and was out of service when the Senate met, and Squadron Sergt. Maj. Horace Higgins, Twelfth Cavalry, promoted to be a second lieutenant of infantry, but not nominated in consequence of evidence of moral delinquency filed in the Department prior to the meeting of the Senate. Commissions, signed by the President, were issued to all of these officers of the character usually designated "recess commissions," each of which specified: "This commission to continue in force during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being and until the end of the next session of the Senate."

Second. A list of such of these officers as failed of confirmation during the special session of the Senate beginning November 9 and ending December 7, 1903, is inclosed. These officers were reappointed December 7, 1903. A copy of the President's order appointing them follows the list. This order of appointment was followed by recess commissions dated December 7, 1903, to all of these officers. These recess commissions were of the same character as those issued during the recess preceding November 9, 1903, that is to say, to continue in force "for the time being and until the end of the next session of the Senate."

E. R. HILLS,
Acting Adjutant-General.

THE DAWES COMMISSION.

Mr. BATE, from the Select Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a memorial of members of the Dawes Commission in regard to certain representations made especially to the Senate by R. C. Adams as attorney for the Delawares concerning the Commission and its action in connection with the making of the Delaware segregation and concerning the members of the Commission in their personal as well as their official capacity, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents for the year 1903, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Patents; which was agreed to.

REPORTS OF LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Pringing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 37) providing for the editions to be printed of the annual and special reports of the Librarian of Congress, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that of the annual and special reports of the Librarian of Congress hereafter submitted to Congress, but including the report for 1903, there shall be printed and bound in cloth 7,250 copies, 750 copies for the use of the Senate, 1,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for the use of the Library of Congress.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3015) to provide for an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, to report it favorably with amendments. The business has become very much congested there, and if there is no objection I should like to have the bill acted upon at the present time.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was in section 1, page 1, line 3, after the word "President," to strike out the words "of the United States;" so as to make the section read:

That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, who shall reside in said district and who shall possess the same powers, perform the same duties, and receive the same salary as the present district judge of said district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS KENNEDY.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. CLAPP, by request, on the 13th ultimo, reported adversely thereon, and it was postponed indefinitely, as follows:

Resolved, That Thomas Kennedy be employed by the Sergeant-at-Arms as laborer in the Senate folding room, at a salary of $840 per annum, to be paid from the contingent expenses of the Senate, the said employment to take effect January 15, 1904.

COURTS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 707) to amend an act entitled "An act providing the terms and places of holding the courts of the United States in the district of Minnesota, and for other purposes," approved April 26, 1890. On account of the importance of the subject, I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 4 of the act, so as to read:

SEC. 4. That regular terms of the circuit and district courts shall be held as follows: For the first division, on the third Tuesday in May and the third Tuesday in November; for the second division, on the fourth Tuesday in April and the fourth Tuesday in October; for the third division, on the first Tuesday in June and the first Tuesday in December; for the fourth division, on the first Tuesday in April and the first Tuesday in October; for the fifth division, on the second Tuesday in January and the second Tuesday in July; for the sixth division, on the first Tuesday in May and the second Tuesday in November.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUIS J. SOUER.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the amendment submitted by myself on the 15th instant, proposing to credit the accounts of Louis J. Souer, collector of internal revenue for the collection district of Louisiana, with the sum of $3,861.88, being the value of tax-paid spirit stamps forwarded by registered mail March 21, 1902, and destroyed by fire in a railway postal car, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF JAMES MARQUETTE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 30, 1904.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be given to the people of Wisconsin for the statue of James Marquette, the renowned missionary and explorer.

Resolved, That the statue be accepted, to remain in the National Statuary Hall, in the Capitol of the nation, and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the presiding officers of the House of Representatives and Senate, be forwarded to his excellency the governor of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I rise to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

I desire only to state that in 1898 the proposition embodied in the resolution was passed upon by both Houses of Congress, and the State of Wisconsin was thereby authorized to present this marble of Pere Marquette, notwithstanding the fact that he was not technically a resident of the State. In 1896 the marble was presented, and it was accepted by the Senate of the United States with appropriate speeches and ceremonies.

The present resolution is only a complimentary tender of thanks to the people of the State of Wisconsin for the presentation of this marble. The Senate having twice expressed its views upon this subject, and this being nothing but a complimentary resolution, I can see no reason, sir, why any committee of this body should be troubled with it.

I therefore ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

REMOVAL OF SNOW AND ICE.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 98) to provide for the removal of snow and ice from the streets, cross walks, and gutters of the District of Columbia was read twice by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is an emergency matter, and I ask present consideration for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read to the Senate.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, for the removal of snow and ice from the streets, cross walks, and gutters in the District of Columbia, one half of said sum to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the other half out of the Treasury of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HALE. There is so much confusion in the Chamber that we do not know even what measure this is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a joint resolution from the House appropriating $5,000 for clearing the streets of snow and ice.

Mr. HALE. Now, let me ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether all the appropriations for removing snow and ice, which become at times here very serious obstructions to travel, are made by piecemeal—whether we wait until a snowstorm comes and blocks the streets and stops business to a degree and interferes with travel? Does Congress always appropriate piecemeal as the occasion comes around? If it does, why is it not better somewhere on some appropriation bill to provide a sum large enough to cover an entire session of Congress?

We have been in Washington put to the greatest inconvenience for the last month. We had one fall of snow, ice formed, it was difficult to get to business places, travel becoming very hard, and as that lasted it merged into another storm with a great deposit of snow in Washington days ago. Now we are appropriating four or five days after the evil has fallen upon us for relieving it.

I should be glad to see the Commissioners intrusted with a fund for an entire season, so that the moment a snowstorm begins at once hundreds of men, if necessary, could be put on, and we can do as they do in other cities and not wait for the slow process of the snow melting and removing itself.

I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, not in any way finding fault with him, because these matters originate in the other branch, that we had better provide in some of the general appropriation bills for a fund which the Commissioners of the District of Columbia can use at once and not wait for days and days of delay after every storm.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the suggestions of the Senator from Maine as respects this particular matter of snow and ice I think are wise. We have been dealing with this question for a good many years on the District of Columbia appropriation bill. Snow has fallen and ice has accumulated during all these years, and as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] says to me, that will probably be the case in the future. Of course I will not prophesy as to that.

We did for several years increase the appropriation as it came from the House from $1,000 to $5,000. Uniformly the House replied to us that if additional appropriations were needed they would be supplied, so that we yielded. I think that was the case in two or three instances at least, perhaps more. An appropriation of $1,000 was inserted in the District of Columbia appropriation bill originally for the purpose of removing snow and ice.

At the beginning of this session there was a special appropriation made of $5,000 for this purpose. I believe it was all expended either during the pendency of the first storm or the following. Then came another storm last week, I believe beginning on Thursday. The Senator from Maine will correct me if I make a mistake. It continued on Friday. The House of Representatives, on Friday, passed the joint resolution which has just been laid before the Senate, but passed it too late in the day for consideration in this body. The pressure was so great on Friday that we reluctantly adjourned over until to-day, which is Monday, leaving the snow and ice hanging.

Mr. HALE. In the air?

Mr. ALLISON. Not in the air, but on the trees and streets and sidewalks. Now, this is the first opportunity we have had to act upon the joint resolution. The Chair has kindly laid it before the Senate, and whilst I agree with the Senator from Maine that it comes rather late, it is better now than not at all. In the future I shall be glad to have the Senator from Maine exert his power upon the Committee on Appropriations to secure a reasonable permanent appropriation for this purpose and place it in the hands of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. I think that ought to be done.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEBRASKA SENATORIAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. DIETRICH. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. By a Federal grand jury at Omaha I have recently been indicted for alleged violation of the laws of the United States, and on a trial of the indictments before a Federal court at Omaha was discharged by the Federal judge without the cause being heard upon its merits, upon the ground that my acts were no violation of the Federal law.

Before taking further part in the deliberations of this body I owe a duty to the Senate, whose honor has been assailed, to the State which in part I represent, whose credit has been attacked, and to myself, whose integrity has been impugned. If guilty of the least of these charges, I deserve to be driven from this high place in disgrace and receive the severest penalty of the criminal law. Confident in my innocence, I desire to submit the whole matter to the Senate.

The reason of my being denied a full trial was clearly brought out in a published statement made by ex-United States Senator Charles F. Manderson, from which I will quote the following:

When the bribery case was brought on for trial the purpose of the district attorney was apparent. He knew that DIETRICH was not a Senator of the United States until he had qualified by taking the oath of office. In an opening statement he put unnecessary and suspicious emphasis upon the fact that while DIETRICH was elected Senator in March he did not take the oath until December, and the transactions complained of were during the spring and summer months. This statement challenged the attention of both counsel and court to the fact that the Government would of necessity have its case dismissed at the close of the testimony for the prosecution, and the opportunity would thus be given to those disposed to smirch the Senator to give testimony that would be uncontradicted by him and by witnesses he might bring into court, for the reason that none of them would be heard and the jury would be instructed by the court at the end of the Government's testimony to return a verdict of not guilty.

There was nothing for DIETRICH's counsel to do except to challenge the attention of the court to the statement of the prosecutor, and demand that if the case was to be dismissed at the end of the testimony for the prosecution, that it should be done before those interested in Senator DIETRICH's downfall could air their animosities upon the witness stand. I knew that this course was strongly deprecated by Senator DIETRICH, and his attorneys would have been glad to have had a full trial upon the merits, but, as Judge Vandeventer said, referring to the statement of District Attorney Summers: "Evidence has been rendered unnecessary, and it is the duty of the jury to find him not guilty."

Mr. President, I shall make no remarks in extenuation, nor shall I present any defense, except that which is sustained by the best of evidence. I strongly deprecate that I could not have had a full trial upon the merits of the case, and in order that I may have an opportunity to establish my innocence upon the facts and evidence, as well as upon the law, I ask that the resolution which I send to the desk may be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska submits a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President pro tempore shall appoint a committee of five to investigate and report to the Senate all the facts connected with the appointment of Jacob Fisher as postmaster at Hastings, Nebr., and the leasing of the building used at this time for a post-office in that city, and particularly to investigate and report as to the action of CHARLES H. DIETRICH, a Senator from Nebraska, in connection with such appointment and leasing, with power to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer; and the expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will necessarily have to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that he strike out from the resolution the last clause and have the resolution in that form now adopted. Subsequently, by a separate resolution, he can obtain authority for the committee to take testimony.

Mr. DIETRICH. I ask that the change suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts be made in the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska modifies his resolution by striking out the last two lines.

Mr. LODGE. Let the resolution be read as it will stand when modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the President pro tempore shall appoint a committee of five to investigate and report to the Senate all the facts connected with the appointment of Jacob Fisher as postmaster at Hastings, Nebr., and the leasing of the building used at this time for a post-office in that city, and particularly to investigate and report as to the action of CHARLES H. DIETRICH, a Senator from Nebraska, in connection with such appointment and leasing.

Mr. TILLMAN. It seems to me, Mr. President, that this resolution clearly belongs to one of our regular committees, the Committee on Privileges and Elections, because it involves the rights, privileges, and honor of the Senator from Nebraska. That, it seems to me, is the proper committee to which the resolution should go. I move that as an amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from South Carolina will, upon reflection, conclude that this matter does not belong to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as it does not relate to the question of the election of a Senator or a privilege, but relates to a charge against a Senator in this body. I have examined very thoroughly the precedents from the beginning, and I know of no instance where a question of this kind has been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. In the case of Senator Matthews, of Ohio, and in the cases of other Senators in every instance the matter was considered by a special committee composed of five or seven Senators. That is the usual course. I therefore hope the Senator from South Carolina will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no other desire regarding the matter except to expedite the investigation as much as possible. I merely thought that, instead of having a special committee of five appointed, as we already had a regular committee, the matter would be taking its usual course by being referred to the regular standing committee. But of course I want to take whatever is the usual course.

Mr. BURROWS. The course I have suggested is the usual course. As to the suggestion of the Senator that it would expedite action upon the resolution by referring it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I think it would rather retard it, because that committee has all it can do at the present time.

Mr. TILLMAN. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as it has been modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently appointed Mr. HOAR, Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, Mr. SPOONER, Mr. COCKRELL, and Mr. PETTUS as the committee provided for in the resolution submitted by Mr. DIETRICH.

REPORT OF THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Philippines, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, a letter from the Secretary of War, dated January 28, 1904, accompanied by the annual report of the Philippine Commission, dated December 23, 1903, and the appendixes thereto, submitted in compliance with the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippines, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902, and the act entitled "An act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1903.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, February 1, 1904.

CLAIMS OF ARIZONA COUNTIES.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 11) to authorize certain officers of the Treasury Department to audit and certify claims of certain counties of Arizona.

Mr. HALE. Has the morning business been concluded, Mr. President?

Mr. MORGAN. I prefer to get through with the morning business before proceeding with other matters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is one resolution lying on the table.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the Senator from Utah that he wait until the conclusion of the morning business.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought it had been concluded.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will withhold the request for the present.

WILLIAM D. CRUM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], coming over from a previous day; which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. TILLMAN on the 29th of January, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, instructed to send to the Senate information in regard to the appointment of William D. Crum as collector of the port of Charleston, S. C., and that he answer specifically the following questions:

First. Is William D. Crum now holding a commission as collector? If so, give date, and send to the Senate a verbatim copy thereof.

Second. Was his second appointment made in accordance with law; and if so, what law?

Third. Is there any law or precedent for the holding of an office of this kind by a "de facto" official?

Fourth. Is it the contention or intention to claim and exercise the authority to make such appointments during a constructive recess, as this appears to be?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from South Carolina is not in his place at present. I am not sure but that he would be willing to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TILLMAN entered the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that a resolution has just been read before the Senate, submitted by the Senator, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to the appointment of Mr. Crum.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, upon fuller investigation of the information already furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury and the present status of this matter, I feel that the Senate already has all that it needs for the intelligent disposition of the case.

There is, however, another resolution which I had the honor to offer, which was sent by the Senate to the Secretary of War, bearing upon the question of a constructive recess and the issuing of commissions of some kind to certain officers of the Army, which I understand has not yet been responded to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that it was responded to this morning.

Mr. TILLMAN. I had not heard of it. If that information is already here, I should like to have it laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has already been laid before the Senate, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I ask that it be now read. so that I may determine what course I may wish to take in reference to the pending resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter of the Secretary of War has been sent out to be printed. It is quite a lengthy document.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, Mr. President, possibly I had better let the whole thing go over until to-morrow, when the reply of the Secretary of War will be printed, and we can get the whole subject together and act on it. I ask that the resolution may go over, retaining its place, until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

CLAIMS OF ARIZONA COUNTIES.

Mr. SMOOT. I now renew my request for unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 11.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 11) to authorize certain officers of the Treasury Department to audit and certify claims of certain counties of Arizona. It authorizes the Auditor for the State and other Departments to examine all claims which may be presented in proper form by the different counties in Arizona Territory, and to ascertain the amount due each of said counties on account of legal costs and expenses incurred from March 3, 1889, to June 30, 1899, in the prosecution of Indians under the act of March 2, 1885 (23 Stats., p. 385), for which the United States is liable under act of March 3, 1889 (Stat. L., v. 25, p. 1004), and which have been paid by said counties, the amounts so found to be certified by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House for a deficiency appropriation.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERATION OF PANAMA TREATY.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I desire to say that I am anxious that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the Panama treaty very soon, and that if there are any addresses to be made by Senators before we go into executive session I hope they will be prepared to make them as the opportunity offers. The general discussion has proceeded for a good while, but not to the extent it ought to have gone in occupying the time of the Senate daily. I hope hereafter Senators will be ready to speak in open session, if that is the place for them to speak, as opportunity may present itself. I say this because I am very anxious that we shall very soon get into executive session for the consideration of the Panama treaty.

PURCHASE FROM NEW PANAMA CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I desire to call up Senate resolution No. 57.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama calls up a resolution, which will be read.

Mr. MORGAN. I have made a little modification of it, and I will ask the Secretary to read the resolution as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama has modified his resolution, and it will be read as modified.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN December 15, 1903, as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General is directed to inform the Senate whether he has made, or is making, on behalf of the United States, a purchase from the New Panama Canal Company of any property rights, privileges, or concessions that were granted by the Republic of Colombia to N. B. Wyse for the construction of a canal at Panama, or any interest in the Panama Railroad, or any part of the stock of the Panama Railroad Company chartered under the laws of New York; and if such purchase has been made, or is being attempted or negotiated, under what state or government is the sale of any or all such property authorized to be made by the New Panama Canal Company?

2. And that he will inform the Senate as to the terms of such proposed purchase, or consummated purchase, including the sum to be paid for such property and canal rights and privileges, and that he will send to the Senate copies of all papers relating thereto, so as to inform the Senate fully as to the entire transaction.

3. That he will inform the Senate as to any participation of the Government of France in such purchase or sale, whether the same is proposed or consummated, and whether any and what agreement has been entered into between France and the authorities now exercising the powers of the government on the Isthmus of Panama in respect of said purchase and sale of the property and rights of the New Panama Canal Company.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it is my purpose, in asking the Senate to vote this resolution, to get the facts that are not yet within the reach of the Senate which affect our duty in acting upon article 22 of the Hay-Varilla treaty.

I will present facts that are of record in support of the resolution, which, I believe, will demonstrate the necessity for its adoption. I think they will be found sufficient to enable us at least to avoid the unwise and humiliating connection with the New Panama Canal Company that the Hay-Varilla treaty forces upon the United States.

It is my purpose to present truly and upon facts of record what is our duty in the state of affairs now existing in Panama and that recently existed in Colombia, and to prevent, if I can, the unnecessary and unwarranted intrusion of the New Panama Canal Company into the treaty relations we are engaged in establishing between the people of Panama and the United States.

To do this I will examine and present the facts now of record that relate to the foundation of the claim of that company to the grossly unjust demands set up in this treaty and to its persistent interference with our Government in its efforts to construct an isthmian canal.

For, whatever else is done or accomplished by the Hay-Varilla treaty, there is no reason or justice in so shaping it that it shall confer upon the New Panama Canal Company any other benefits or advantages than it is entitled to under the concessions it holds from Colombia. When these are fully secured to it justice will be done.

When the full measure of their rights under the obligations of their contracts is secured to them our duty will be performed. That company has no claim to our regard or sympathy for any service they have rendered to the United States or any other country. On the contrary, it has been an incubus on the French people that has stripped millions of them of the fruits of their toil by fraud, amounting to robbery, and is now demanding for its membership what rightfully belongs to those people, most of whom belong to the laboring classes.

If we must deal with them in this treaty, as I claim that there is no just reason or excuse for doing, let us give them all they can justly demand when they have complied with the obligations of their contracts.

I invite the scrutiny of the Senate and of all persons to the history I will give of the operations and dealings of those who own and control the New Panama Canal Company, taken from the undisputed records.

In what condition was the canal question when this company first intruded itself into the policy of the United States and undertook to control it?

The importance of this inquiry and of a full response to it can not be exaggerated.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty did not apply to Colombia. It applied in its operative provisions only to the political division known as "Central America," which never included Panama. When that treaty was abrogated every international difficulty as to the construction of an isthmian canal disappeared.

The President who cleared away these obstructions and by his wise forecast opened the way along the valley of the San Juan River, which the people approved with rejoicing and with gifts of money to construct the canal, was William McKinley.

The Senate had twice rejected treaties with Colombia to construct a canal at Panama, once in the Administration of President Johnson and again in that of President Grant.

The people considered that route as condemned; and it was. But when Congress in both Houses had adopted the Nicaragua route in different Congresses by such majorities as are seldom given to any measure, the Panama Canal Company appeared and urged its demands upon us, first under the lead of De Lesseps and the old company. Then came the New Panama Canal Company, with Bonnardel, Hutin, Cromwell, and Bunau-Varilla as its leaders and promoters. The purpose of these men was to gain absolute control of the movement and to turn over the wreck of the Panama Canal to the United States for the highest possible price, through the assistance of Marroquin. De Lesseps's efforts to destroy our policies were directed to the breaking down of a competitive waterway through Nicaragua, in which he failed, and his company went into bankruptcy.

In the Hay-Herran treaty these plans were thus formulated: The New Panama Canal Company was to get the sum of $40,000,000; Colombia was interested to the amount of $10,000,000, the price of her concessions, and $1,000,000, the price of her stock in the New Panama Canal Company, and $4,500,000, the cash value of lands returned to her, and a perpetual annuity of $250,000, to continue without end. To accomplish this raid it was necessary to destroy the project of the Nicaragua Canal, that McKinley had secured by the protocols of December 1, 1900.

He passed away, and his successor turned the whole power of the Administration in favor of the Panama route and against the Nicaragua route. Not questioning the right of the President to thus exercise his preference, I can safely say that it is not in the power of man to remove or to impair the great record that sustains the Nicaraguan route as being the most feasible and practicable route for an isthmian canal. No such record was ever made and none was ever sustained by higher authority in any controverted matter than that which rests upon the immutable foundation laid by Commodore Maury and built upon by many scores of the greatest engineers in the world.

I do not propose to surrender the final hope or purpose of the people of the United States to realize the value of the counsels of these great men in opening a canal on the Nicaragua route.

Especially will I not sacrifice the rights already secured by President McKinley and by the Spooner law for this vital, national purpose. Above all I will not assist in this work of fatal injury to the country by voting to destroy the great work he has done. I can see nothing but breach of faith and dishonor in such a course.

Treating the proposed canal at Panama as a work that will be undertaken, and hoping, against my own conviction, that it may be successfully accomplished, I feel as deep an interest as any member of this body that there shall not be added to the enormous physical difficulties that stand in the way of success any sort of connection with or responsibility for the scandalous reputation of the old and new Panama Canal companies on the part of the United States.

I wish to point out to the Senate a way in which the Panama Canal can be constructed without incurring on the part of the Senate any just accusation of complicity in those scandals, which have driven a Cabinet minister from office in the United States and have caused the resignation of an entire government in France, and have consigned so great a benefactor to the world as Ferdinand De Lesseps—an innocent man, as I hope and believe—to a felon's grave.

I wish to present record evidence that will establish the fact that the New Panama Canal Company, to which article 22 of this treaty secures great powers over the United States, that are backed by the power of France, has not only taken by succession and inheritance the crimes of the old company, and that its membership consists, in large part, of the persons who gave the old company its bad reputation, but that it has added a darker defamation and worse wrongs to that wretched history by its own acts.

The history of the new company has its origin in the wreck of the old company, that was brought about by some of its controlling men who are now the principal stockholders and managers of the New Panama Canal Company—the same men with whom we are now dealing.

To prove this I will quote from the final report of the Isthmian Canal Commission of November 1901, on page 83, and from the testimony of Hon. Samuel Pasco, given in the hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals:

> The liquidator [of the old company] found himself laboring under special legal difficulties, from which he obtained relief by the special law of the French Chambers, dated July 1, 1893. (See Appendix KK.) He finally secured the organization of a new company on the 20th of October, 1894, with a capital stock of 650,000 shares of 100 francs each. Six hundred thousand shares had been subscribed to be paid for in cash, and 50,000 shares were given as full-paid stock to the Colombian Government in compliance with the terms of the extension of the concession, dated December 26, 1890. Thus the cash capital of the company was 60,000,000 francs, or $11,640,000, a sum deemed sufficient for the provisional operations contemplated.
> The scandals connected with the failure of the old company, which had led to the prosecution and conviction of De Lesseps and other prominent persons, had made it difficult to secure even that amount. Suits had been brought against certain loan associations, administrators, contractors, and others who were supposed to have unduly profited by the extravagant management of the old company. A series of compromises were made with these persons, by which it was agreed that they should subscribe for stock in the new company on condition that the suits should be dropped. Whatever amount remained to make up the 60,000,000 francs, after deducting the sums thus obtained and those to be obtained by public subscription, was to be subscribed by the liquidator. The stock was subscribed as follows, viz:

	Francs.
Eiffel	10,000,000
Crédit Lyonnais	4,000,000
Société Générale	4,000,000
Crédit Industriel et Commercial	2,000,000
Administrators of the old company	7,885,000
Artigue, Sonderegger & Co	2,200,000
Baratoux, Letellier & Co	2,200,000
Jacob heirs	750,000
Couvreux, Hersent & Co	500,000
Various persons to the number of 60, who had profited by syndicates created by the old company	3,285,700
Hugo Oberndorffer	3,800,000
Public subscription	3,484,300
The liquidator	15,895,000
Total	60,000,000

> (See fourth report of the liquidator to the court, dated November 26, 1895, pp. 8, 9, and 13.)
> The old company and the liquidator had raised by the sale of stock and bonds the sum of $246,700,431.68.
> The securities issued to raise this money had a face value of $435,559,332.80. The number of persons holding them is estimated at over 200,000.

Mr. Pasco testified as follows:

> The CHAIRMAN. Is that report among the appendixes?
> Mr. PASCO. No; it is not.
> Senator MORGAN. Have you a copy of it?
> Mr. PASCO. There was a copy in the possession of General Ernst, I think. He will be before you next week.
> Senator MORGAN. Is it in French or English?
> Mr. PASCO. I think it is in French. He and I had it there. We had all these reports and examined them.
> Senator MORGAN. You of course had information upon this very important and rather peculiar situation, as to the men who were being pursued, I suppose, in the legal proceedings of course, probably civilly and probably criminally, for the purpose of compelling them to disgorge money that they had obtained from this company and had misused and squandered. You had the names of those people?
> Mr. PASCO. That is the only list I know of.
> Senator MORGAN. Are all of these mentioned here men of this character?
> Mr. PASCO. I do not know the history of every subscription. There were compromises, and I do not know the history of all those compromises. I only know the fact that those suits and compromises were made and contributions were made to the stock of the company.
> Senator MORGAN. Now, you saw enough in the proof before you, the evidence before you, to authorize you to make this very strong statement about them?
> Mr. PASCO. This was prepared by General Ernst, and it is a part of the chapter on the Panama route.
> Senator MORGAN. And the Commission authorized it?
> Mr. PASCO. Oh, yes; it is stated as a part of the report of the Commission.
> Senator MORGAN. It is a finding of fact by the Commission?
> Mr. PASCO. Yes; this is the best information that the Commission had upon the subject.
> Senator MORGAN. Who were these administrators of the old company who subscribed 7,885,000 francs?
> Mr. PASCO. I can not tell you who they are.
> Senator MORGAN. I do not mean the individuals. What office was it that they held? You call them the "administrators" of the old company. What is an administrator?
> Mr. PASCO. I can not give you any information with reference to the stockholders other than there is there.
> Senator MORGAN. Do you know what that means—"administrators of the old company?"
> Mr. PASCO. No; I do not know what it means.
> Senator MORGAN. Did you find anywhere in the statutes or charter of the old company any such office as "administrator?"
> Mr. PASCO. No; I have not thought it necessary to examine.
> Senator MORGAN. You have not examined into that?
> Mr. PASCO. No, sir.
> Senator MORGAN. "Various persons to the number of 60 who had profited by syndicates created by the old company." I wish you would explain that. How had they profited by the syndicates created by the old company?
> Mr. PASCO. I suppose that is a part of the matter referred to on the previous page. It is an interesting fact in the history of these subscriptions, but it does not affect the fact that they had subscribed.
> Senator MORGAN. Public subscription, 3,848,000 francs. I suppose that was by the general public.
> Mr. PASCO. The general public put their money in.
> Senator MORGAN. And then the liquidator comes in with 15,895,000 francs.
> Mr. PASCO. Yes.

This proof might have been added to if our Commissioners had thought it worth while, but what they have stated is conclusive of the fact that this New Panama Canal Company was a forlorn hope to relieve a situation in France that demanded any remedy that would ease it. Frauds were to be forgiven; judgments and claims for damages were to be released; convictions were to be annulled; pardons were to be granted, and the robbers and convicts were to organize this new company and take over all the assets of the old company on their agreement to complete the canal. And these are the men we are dealing with.

To show the conditions that forced France to create this company, as the last hope of quelling serious public disturbance, I will quote from the work of Professor Keasbey (pp. 430–432) on isthmian canals, etc.

He says:

> The pace grew quicker as the years went by, until 1887, when the funds ran short, and only about two-fifths of the canal had been dug.
> To meet this fearful drain on the funds De Lesseps had first to call for fresh payments on the stock and issue new bonds. But these sources of revenue soon came to an end. The stock then began to be sold out at a large discount and fresh loans on the bonds could no longer be floated. De Lesseps continued to make fresh promises at every stockholders' meeting, but with so little to show for the money already spent the fears of the holders were not to be so easily averted. To stave off the inevitable crisis the press had to also be bribed more liberally than ever, and to keep the condition of affairs from being brought up in the Chamber deputies and even dignified senators had to be hushed.

The company's affairs were now in a desperate condition, and at this juncture it was decided to abandon the sea-level project and resort to the lock system, thus reducing the amount of the excavation by 85,000,000 cubic yards. But this was a fatal modification, for only by promising a straight tide-level canal had De Lesseps won adherents to his Panama project at all, and even with this reduction in the amount of excavation the cost of the canal was now raised to something over $300,000,000, according to the new estimates. A contract was nevertheless made with M. Eiffel, the famous engineer, to undertake the new works, and elaborate plans were presented. On this fresh basis the company then again applied to the Government for its approval of the lottery loan, but was again refused. An eloquent petition was then gotten up with 185,000 names attached, and this time the Government gave way and sanctioned the plan. The effort cost the company large sums, however, and it was all to no purpose after all, for on December 14, 1888, the final crash came and payments had to be suspended.

A parliamentary inquiry was at once instituted in the hope of saving the enterprise, but its revelations only brought about still more calamitous results, as we shall presently see. Work on the canal was soon after discontinued, and with all the funds that had passed through its hands the company had only succeeded in excavating between 15 and 20 miles of the least difficult portions of the canal, leaving still the most difficult portion to be dug through the interior.

The official liquidator then found that the canal had already cost over $262,000,000, whereas De Lesseps had declared that $120,000,000 would complete the work. Of this sum only $160,000,000 had gone into the works, however, the rest having been paid out either in Paris or squandered in Panama. Salaries, profits, commissions, and the like swallowed up $88,000,000, while something approaching $32,000,000 had been paid for floating the various loans. The total expenses in Paris for the eight years amounted in themselves to over $75,000,000. Or, as one of the committee on new proposals put it, one-third of the funds was spent legitimately, one-third was squandered, and one-third was stolen.

These extracts from Professor Keasbey's work are but a faint picture of the terrible condition of the people and Government in France that was created by the frauds and the failure of the old Panama Canal Company.

Who were the men that brought this ruin and disgrace upon France?

The report of Admiral Walker shows that they are, in large part, if not exclusively, the same men who, as contractors and directors of the old company, had robbed it of hundreds of millions of francs and then organized the New Panama Canal Company, and still own its stock, and that they are here now pushing its demands on the United States to aid them in recouping the money they put into it, for which we are asked to provide not less than 33 per cent profit. Unless all accounts are false, M. Bunau-Varilla was among the men who wrecked the old company, and he is now the minister plenipotentiary of the new company, engaged in making the supreme law for the people of the United States in this treaty, and largely for his own benefit.

This is the most startling adventure that has been attempted on any government in modern times, and I have found no parallel for it in older history.

I must ask the Senate and the President to pause and take breath at article 22 of this Hay-Varilla treaty, which is intended to force this outrage upon the country, and to consider the evidence I will produce to prove it. It will not take much longer time at most than was consumed in the very hurried final act of settling and signing that treaty, which enabled Bunau-Varilla and his associates to make the thrifty speculation in the bonds of the old Panama Canal Company on or about the same day on which it was signed.

Admiral Walker and his associates seem to have been easily put off in their researches into the frauds, felonies, convictions, and the pardons granted to the members of the New Panama Canal Company.

The lawyer on the Commission, Mr. Pasco, could not escape from making some mention of the matter, in the guarded language I have quoted from that report, but the Commission was very deferential to French reputations and contented itself with mentioning the fact that there were sixty persons in the list of the convicted and pardoned felons whose names are not given, and it is intimated in the report that the French Government was unwilling that those names should be disclosed. These sixty persons subscribed 3,285,700 francs to the stock of the New Panama Canal Company, the scapegoat for the sins of those malefactors that has been turned loose, not to perish in the wilderness, but to fatten in the rich pasture grounds of the United States.

If this resolution is adopted and fully answered, it will bring to light those refugees who are being so carefully concealed from observation, and some of our syndicated speculators in the bonds of the old company will be unearthed. If the stories that fill the newspapers as the intangible fogs sometimes saturate the atmosphere are true, M. Bunau-Varilla was among the contractors and officers who brought this ruin on the old Panama Company. He makes it his chief distinction, in commending himself to the President as envoy extraordinary from Panama, that he is "the champion of the old Panama Canal Company." Let us see, also, if he is justly accused of being one of its robbers.

Eiffel, a noted French engineer, was convicted in the French courts of having defrauded the old company, and was heavily fined and sentenced to penal servitude for a long term.

He is to profit by section 22 of this treaty to the extent of not less than 33 per cent on his investment of 10,000,000 francs in the stock of the New Panama Canal Company, in addition to purchasing his pardon from the penitentiary by making that subscription.

This resolution of inquiry is directed to the Attorney-General, instead of the Secretary of State, for the reason that the President directed that all negotiations with the New Panama Canal Company should be conducted by the Department of Justice, at the time the Hay-Herran treaty was under consideration, and I have not learned that this arrangement has been altered with reference to the bargain that is to be made under the Hay-Varilla treaty with that company.

If any Senator can inform me that this matter is now in the hands of the Secretary of State, I will ask to change the resolution to meet that fact.

The resolution calls for information, in the absence of which it is impossible to act on article 22 of the Hay-Varilla treaty either with intelligence or safety.

No part of that treaty places a limit on the sum to be paid by the President for the concessions, rights, or property of the New Panama Canal Company, which, under the Spooner law, was limited not to exceed $40,000,000.

That no limit whatever as to the price of these claims is fixed in the Hay-Varilla treaty is a portent of mischief that no one can fail to understand. It must mean that a greater sum than $40,000,000 is demanded, or is likely to be demanded, by the New Panama Canal Company for these claims and properties, when the contemplated purchase is agreed upon and consummated, in which case the President will have the discretionary right, under article 22 of the treaty, to make an advance in the price to be paid for this property.

Even an honest and just claimant could not decently make such a demand; when it is made for the New Panama Canal Company its audacity is an insult to the country.

That article of the treaty first describes the property and the rights of every description that it permits that company to sell to the United States, and then, in the last paragraph, it provides that the title of the United States is to become absolute as to Panama when "a contemplated purchase" of these things from the New Panama Canal Company is "consummated." After granting to the United States the supreme and exclusive sovereignty over the canal zone, in article 3, to be paid for at the sum of $10,000,000, why should we not be permitted to exercise the same right that Colombia had to compel the canal company to work out its contract? Why should that company become the real vender of the rights ceded to the United States in article 3 of the treaty?

I will insert a copy of that treaty in an appendix to my remarks. [See Appendix A.]

The property and rights thus to be purchased from the canal company by the President include everything acquired by it under any law or concession of Colombia to Napoleon B. Wyse and his transferees or successors and some other property rights acquired from other sources, including the rights of that company in the stock and property of the Panama Railroad.

If the rights of Colombia in respect of these concessions passed to Panama, under a rule of law that Mr. Hay characterizes as rights that "run with the land," when we purchase that land and acquire supreme sovereignty over it, as we do in article 3 of this treaty, all the rights that Panama acquired from Colombia "run with the land," and also the rights acquired under the language of the grant.

The terms of this treaty establish the fact that at the date of the signature thereof by the contracting parties no purchase had been made by the United States of things described in article 22 of the treaty from the New Panama Canal Company. It is therein described as a "contemplated purchase" which remains to be made and "consummated." If any purchase had then been made, a contemplated purchase would be absurd. It could only be valid if an existing purchase should be set aside by the parties.

The terms and conditions of the purchase as to the claims, rights, or property described in article 22 are nowhere stated or alluded to in the treaty, and the Senate has no knowledge or official or unofficial information on the subject.

I can not reasonably expect to be compelled to vote upon the ratification of article 22 of the treaty with Panama when such information as this resolution calls for is withheld from the Senate. Yet, unless it is adopted, or unless the President will voluntarily give us the facts, this will prove to be the actual situation: The Senate is required to blindfold itself in ratifying a "contemplated purchase" of this property at a great price, and also to impose upon Congress a national obligation to appropriate the money to "consummate" the purchase.

I can think of no situation that would be more arbitrary or more humiliating to the Senate on the part of the President than to withhold from this body the state of facts as to the contemplated purchase, which is known only to the President and his advisers, and yet to demand of the Senate that this contemplated contract shall be ratified or approved before its terms are known to us or, it may be, even to the President.

I will not dwell upon the relations of confidence that the Constitution creates between the President and the Senate when they are cooperating in the enactment of supreme law for the United States in conjunction with a foreign state.

This relation ought to prevent the withholding of any fact from the Senate on which it must necessarily pass in enacting a supreme law for the United States, or in enacting such a law with studied omissions in the text that he and the Panama Canal Company may fill at pleasure.

I am quite aware that the confidence of the relation that existed and was so conspicuously manifested by President Washington and his contemporaries and successors has given place to the evil spirit of political partisanship to such a degree that the President and the Senate are often found in severe political antagonism. I am quite satisfied that there is a spirit of political domination that frowns down all efforts of the minority in the Senate to gain information that might be inconvenient in the political policy of the President, and that such requests are regarded as being of the same class with the offense of lese majeste that is so firmly prosecuted in the European monarchies. But there are still rights and duties that should control our conduct in these highest matters of state that for one I will not voluntarily abandon, nor will they be denied to me, as a Senator, without protest.

The Senate is required by this treaty to enact a law that is void on its face for its uncertainty, or else it is only the delegation of power to the President to remove the uncertainty in the law by supplying all the terms of the contemplated contract of purchase in accordance with his own will and at his discretion, without submitting it to the Senate, as a part of the treaty-making power, or to Congress as the lawmaking power, either for consideration or concurrence. This is a domestic matter, in which no foreign government can participate.

If it is only a power of attorney to make such a contract of purchase and to inject it into the treaty after the Senate has ratified it, Panama has no right to assist in conferring such extra-official power upon the President of the United States by treaty, with the consent of the Senate, for that would be a simple act of municipal legislation.

But the power, or the act to be performed, is too indefinite to be made an enactment of supreme law. If it is anything in the form, substance, or spirit of a statute law, it is a bestowal of unlimited discretion upon the President to make a purchase of certain property from the New Panama Canal Company on such terms as to price and payment or such other terms as he may, in his discretion, see fit to make; and the Republic of Panama can not participate with our Senate in such an enactment.

If it stopped there and is only operative as a power of attorney it would be a discretion that might be in some way controlled by Congress, or in some way as yet unknown by the Senate before the action of the President would be finally completed or "consummated."

Instead of this the Senate is required, in advance of any action, declaration, or promise on his part as to what he proposes to do, to ratify all that he may do in making such a purchase and to make it a supreme law of the United States, so that Congress would be under a moral if not a legal obligation to "consummate" the purchase by paying the price for it that the President may see cause to bind Congress to pay.

If he agrees to pay $40,000,000 for this property, which is the sum fixed as the maximum in the Spooner law, the time of payment and the question of title are also left to his discretion. Or, if he is willing to raise the price to any sum that meets the demands of the New Panama Canal Company, that price is foreordained if the Senate ratifies that treaty.

Comment on such a situation could not be otherwise than indignant and resentful on the part of Senators who respect the rights of the Senate, the Constitution, or the rights of a free people.

The peril of this situation is far greater than its absurdity when the facts and conditions that have made it the leading feature of the strange policy of the President in dealing with Panama are understood.

Admit that Panama is an established republic, independent of Colombia, which is not true under the principles of international law; and that the New Panama Canal Company has ceased to be a juridical citizen of Colombia, which is not true as matter of fact or law; and that Panama has the right which Colombia had to consent to the sale by the Panama Canal Company of the concessionary rights through the Wyse concession, and that they are severed from Colombia and have passed, irreclaimably, to Panama, which is not true; and that such rights can be conferred on the United States by this treaty, which is not true. Admit all this, and we will only have reached the margin of the real purpose and effect of article 22 of the Hay-Varilla treaty. That article establishes another fixed qualification upon these rights, which is that we shall never own them until we have purchased and paid for them under agreement with the Panama Canal Company.

That treaty gives to Panama the power to deny to the United States the absolute right to the full ownership and possession even of the canal zone after we have paid her $10,000,000 for it until we have made and "consummated" "the contemplated purchase" of the things that are mentioned in article 22 of the treaty from the New Panama Canal Company.

The Spooner law and the Hay-Herran treaty did not give to Colombia any such authority over our dealings with the New Panama Canal Company as this treaty gives to Panama.

In the Spooner law the sum to be paid for all the rights and property of the canal companies was not to exceed $40,000,000. In this treaty there is no limit. In the Spooner law the purchase of that property was required to be arranged for before a treaty with Colombia could be made, and Colombia had no part in the terms of the purchase or anything else except to consent that the canal company might enter into agreement with the United States for its purchase.

Did Panama impose these fetters upon us in the majesty of her sovereign powers or are they self-imposed by the United States?

Did Panama require that we should first make the contemplated purchase from the Panama Canal Company, on its own terms, before our purchase of the canal zone from her should confer upon the United States the absolute right to the property for which we are required to pay her $10,000,000 at the time of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty? And was this done for some great reason of state, that might be important to the glory and power of Panama and might be demanded by the nobility of her sentiment toward the New Panama Canal Company, or toward M. Bunau-Varilla, the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Panama, who signed the treaty with Mr. Hay? Panama had no purpose in prescribing this handicap on the United States, or in any other part of this proceeding, except to do the will of the Panama Canal Company.

This twenty-second article of the Hay-Varilla treaty introduces a third "high contracting power" into this factory for making supreme law for the United States that is a stranger to this country in every sense except as a conspirator against our Treasury and the peace and the welfare of the people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). The Senator from Alabama will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, unless otherwise ordered, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, which is Senate resolution 82, submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. CULLOM. I hope whatever is the order regularly may be laid aside until the Senator from Alabama concludes his remarks.

While I am up, Mr. President, I do not desire to call attention especially to what the Senator is saying, but I think he is getting a little outside of the rule in discussing the twenty-second article of the treaty which is before the Senate in executive session.

Mr. MORGAN. I am discussing the effect of the treaty, particularly one article of it, upon the people of the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. I know; but I submit to the Senator whether according to the rule he is not going beyond what under the practice prescribed he has a right to in the premises; in other words, whether he is not violating the rules of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not criticising at all the treaty as a law document as it will be when it gets on the statute books of the United States as the supreme law.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator is discussing the treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not criticising the motives of anybody who has had any hand in negotiating it. I am merely showing, as well as I know how to show, that it is an act of injustice to the reputation of the people of the United States that the New Panama Canal Company should be allowed to intrude into it in any way whatever.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand; but I submit to the Senator on his own judgment whether, in discussing the twenty-second article of the treaty, which is now before the Senate in executive session, he is not overstepping the rule without authority from the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, let us test that by the next matter that I was going to say. This twenty-second article of the Hay-Varilla treaty——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will suspend for a moment. The Senator from Illinois asks, as the Chair understands him, that the regular order be laid aside so that the Senator from Alabama may continue his remarks.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly. I supposed that had been done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. I am speaking now, and have been speaking, and will be speaking about what I call a third high contracting power that has been brought into this treaty, with power to regulate its destiny, with power to prevent its operation after we have ratified it, until that third power is satisfied in respect of an agreement that is contemplated to be made with it that it has been fully consummated.

Mr. CULLOM. While I think the Senator is outside of the rule governing executive and legislative sessions, yet I am not disposed to make the point if he will bear in mind that until otherwise authorized he shall keep within the rule of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. The point could have been more appropriately made fifty times during this debate than it can be made upon the proposition I am now advancing, for the reason that I am not discussing the act of either of the contracting powers to the treaty, but of a third high contracting power that is intruded into it by its provisions. I want to say that that third contracting power ought not to be allowed any day in court, except to receive justice at the hands of the people and Congress of the United States according to their contract.

This twenty-second article of the Hay-Varilla treaty introduces a third "high contracting power" into this factory for making supreme law for the United States that is a stranger to this country in every sense, except as a conspirator against our Treasury and the peace and the welfare of our people. The New Panama Canal Company is that high contracting power. It first contrives and has confirmed by an agreement between France and Panama—that is, outside of this treaty—that its rights and claims of every kind under the laws of Colombia shall be solemnly guaranteed and protected by Panama as the successor government to Colombia.

Then Panama agrees with the United States, in the Hay-Varilla treaty, that the rights of Colombia, under the Wyse concession and its extensions, for the construction of a canal at Panama shall not inure to the United States directly, but shall come through the New Panama Canal Company. With those rights and powers we could compel the New Panama Canal Company to complete the canal; but this treaty provides that we shall annul and surrender these rights and obligations, instead of having the right that Colombia had to compel that company to complete the canal or else to forfeit all of its concessionary rights, without compensation for any of its canal property, or else to sell them to the United States on fair terms. It is the canal company that is made the vender of these alleged rights to the United States under this treaty, not Panama.

What reason can any just man give for requiring the United States not only to surrender these rights and powers to the Panama Canal Company but to become entirely subordinate to the power of that company and to force our Government to buy the property from it, instead of compelling that company to perform the contracts it made with Colombia, if we choose to require that this shall be done?

We engage with Panama, in this treaty, to purchase those rights at a sum to be agreed upon with the New Panama Canal Company, and until that is done and the purchase is consummated the rights of Colombia under the Wyse concessions are not to pass to the United States as against Panama.

This can mean nothing else but this: That until the United States purchases the canal property and railroad stock, at a price to be settled with the New Panama Canal Company, Panama will grant no canal concessions to us in absolute right.

When this treaty is ratified the Panama Canal Company will stand over us with a rod, and France will compel Panama to adhere to and execute the twenty-second article of the Hay-Varilla treaty in its letter.

When we are thus tied up by this treaty with Panama the digging of the canal will not be begun by the United States until the demands of the New Panama Canal Company as to the price of its property are paid, whatever that price may be.

Before the Senate can afford to enter that trap it should at least know the terms of the "contemplated purchase" of this property and the price we are to pay for it.

Other rights of other persons and of other states and corporations exist in that canal zone that are appurtenant to the land, such as the right of New York to protect the property of the Panama Railroad Company and of its stockholders, and their right to refuse to sell their stock and to surrender the property of the company to the United States. Why are we not required to purchase these rights before we can get a title to the railroad from Panama? Who do we ignore the rights of the New York corporation, while we set these French corporation wreckers in authority over the Government of the United States?

There is a meaning in this scheme that is far deeper and more to be sought after and unearthed than the mere inconsistency of this treaty provision.

The answer is plain enough. It is that the Panama Canal Company is the pet of the Government of the United States and the life—the raison d'être—of the Republic of Panama, and it must be provided for and settled with before this treaty can become operative in constructing a canal at Panama.

We are trifling with ourselves and with the American people when we assume that Panama has any interest of her own in shaping the terms of the contemplated contract we are to make for the purchase of the property and alleged concessions of the New Panama Canal Company acquired from Colombia?

Her interests are only to comply with the demands of the Panama Canal Company, that she does not dare to refuse.

She sells us the canal zone, within which these things are all located, and confers upon the United States the supreme and exclusive sovereignty over the canal zone in article 3 of the treaty, for which we pay Panama $10,000,000 on the ratification of that treaty, but she annexes a condition to our purchase that we must first purchase and pay for the property of that company at the sum it may demand.

Why should Panama concern her mighty spirit with cares for the welfare of the New Panama Canal Company and proceed to qualify this grant of the 10-mile zone to us by adding, in article 22, that the grant should not be absolute until a contemplated purchase of the concessions and property of the New Panama Canal Company in that zone is consummated?

This demand of Panama in favor of the New Panama Canal Company as to that contemplated purchase is so strange, unseemly, and apparently unaccountable that it demands some explanation from the Government as to the facts and reasons that have caused us to tie our hands and submit to the will of Panama and the New Panama Canal Company and of France in the leading purpose of this treaty, which is to compel the United States to treat the New Panama Canal Company as the owner of the entire beneficial interest in the canal zone and in all the railroad and canal rights and property in that zone, and to pay Panama $10,000,000 for the privilege of purchasing that interest from the New Panama Canal Company at such price as it shall choose to compel us to pay.

It is the privilege of purchasing these claims, concessions, and properties from the New Panama Canal Company for which we are to pay Panama $10,000,000 that comprises the real consideration for that payment.

Panama's largest money interest in her bargain with the United States is the perpetual annuity of $250,000.

If the concessions made by Colombia to N. B. Wyse and sold by him to the old Panama Canal Company and turned over to the New Panama Canal Company by the liquidator of the old company, with all the rights, duties, and obligations that were attached to them, have passed to Panama, the sale to the United States of the 10-mile canal zone in which these rights and properties exist conveys the property subject to these concessions, with all the duties, rights, and obligations appertaining thereto.

This result is accomplished in the third article of the treaty by conveying to the United States the supreme and exclusive sovereignty over the 10-mile zone.

Under this act of cession, for it is only that, the full power of Congress is established to legislate for that zone and everything and everybody in it. Congress, under our Constitution, in legislating with respect to the rights of the New Panama Canal Company, would be bound to respect and enforce all the vested rights of the New Panama Canal Company within that zone as they exist under the laws of Colombia.

If any of those rights are to be extinguished by purchase from the New Panama Canal Company, Congress must provide the laws under which such purchase can alone be made and the money can be appropriated to consummate it, and all future provisions of law applicable to any rights, duties, and obligations within that zone should be left open and without embarrassment to the legislative powers of Congress.

There is no right arising out of these concessions made by Colombia, no duty that they impose on Colombia or the canal companies, or on anybody else, which follows the transfer of the sovereignty of the 10-mile zone to the United States that the Congress is not as completely invested with the power to enforce and charged with the duty to respect under our Constitution as if the whole of Colombia had been ceded to and incorporated into the territory of the United States.

In the Hay-Herran treaty the United States was to have a perpetual lease, for canal purposes, of a 6-mile zone from the coast at Colon to the coast at Panama, as that treaty was interpreted by our Government.

In the Hay-Varilla treaty the supreme and exclusive sovereignty is ceded to the United States over a 10-mile zone, which lies between the 3-mile limit in the Caribbean Sea, off the Bay of Colon, and the 3-mile limit in the Pacific Ocean, off the Bay of Panama.

Within this 10-mile zone and out to these limits the sovereignty of the United States is as supreme and excluse as it is in our possessions in Alaska, New Mexico, or in any of our insular possessions.

Now, in this situation it became necessary for the purposes of the New Panama Canal Company that the powers of this nascent Republic should be employed in shaping this treaty so as to qualify and limit the sovereign powers of the United States over the canal zone, and so as to compel us to purchase its claims directly from that company at such a price as it would agree to take, and to reach this result the last paragraph of article 22 was inserted.

It has no other office, function, or meaning, and that alone is its fixed purpose.

The New Panama Canal Company has failed to get the $40,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States in consequence of the defeat of the Hay-Herran treaty, and it determined not to lose it and, if possible, to increase that stipend under the Hay-Varilla treaty.

If this treaty is ratified with article 22 in it, that company will certainly succeed in getting the $40,000,000, and will most likely be able to compel us to largely increase that sum.

Or, if it is ratified with article 22 stricken out, the New Panama Canal Company and the Republic of Panama have the assistance of France already pledged for the maintenance of all French interests in Panama, and especially that the Colombian concessions to the Panama Canal Company shall not expire until the 31st of October, 1910.

I again quote the language of M. Delcassé, the French minister of foreign affairs, in answer to an interpellation in the Chamber of Deputies, to prove this statement, as follows:

LATEST INTELLIGENCE—M. DELCASSÉ ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

PARIS, November 22, 1903.

In the course of the debate on the budget for foreign affairs in the Chamber of Deputies this afternoon M. Delcassé, the minister for foreign affairs, made an important statement on some of the questions of the day. He began by congratulating himself on the circumstance that all the political parties had expressed their opinion on all the questions of foreign politics. He now proposed to give the explanations of the Government with a brevity consonant with his functions, which demanded deeds rather than words, and with the reserve which those functions imposed upon him.

In reply to the inquiry whether the Government had officially recognized the new State of Panama, he gave the following particulars. On the 3d instant, for reasons as to which they were not called upon to express an opinion—as it was not for them to interfere in the domestic affairs of another country, the Department of Panama constituted itself into an independent republic. Having received notification of that fact, and from the moment that the new Republic fulfilled the conditions necessary for the maintenance of order and security, they had only to consider what guaranties it offered from a French standpoint. They were not quite free from apprehension for a certain time.

For many months past it had been said at Bogota that the decision of the Colombian Government to grant an extension of six years from 1904 for the completion of the canal was contestable, and that in 1904 the concession might be declared to be forfeited. If that theory had on any occasion been officially formulated, it would never have received the sanction of France; but it was the strict duty of the French ministry to demand from the Government of Panama a preliminary assurance that all French interests, including the rights of the concession, would be respected. They had received the following formal and decisive assurance:

"The Republic of Panama solemnly, expressly, and definitely undertakes vigilantly to protect French interests, as also to maintain and to interpret in the most liberal spirit the contracts concluded before November 3. Those contracts referring to the Isthmus follow the transmission of sovereignty and bind the Republic of Panama. All those contracts are maintained, and particularly the contract prolonging the concession up to 1910."

M. Delcassé added that in these conditions all that remained for them to do was what, as a matter of fact, had already been done by the Government of the United States—namely, to permit the agents of France to enter into relations with all the agents of the new Republic of Panama.

Permit what?

The agents of France to enter into relations with all the agents of the new Republic of Panama.

No answer has been attempted to this dangerous and dishonoring situation in which our Government is placed by this treaty. The American people will not fail to see and understand this matter or resent the humiliation of having France called in by Panama and the canal company to coerce us into an utter subordination to this combination.

Panama pledges herself to France to maintain and interpret in the most liberal spirit the contracts made before November 3. This does not refer alone to contracts made with Colombia, but to contracts between the canal company and the United States.

If Senators will examine the official proceedings of that company of December 30, 1903, in connection with the statement of M. Delcassé, they will see that this pledge covers all contracts, including those heretofore made with the United States. They will also discover, in running these developments back to article 22 of this treaty, the most unworthy and humiliating chapter in American history.

It has been carefully withheld from public scrutiny and we are indebted to the garrulity of M. Bunau-Varilla and Assistant Secretary Loomis at the banquet of the Quill Club for what light we have on this unprecedented attitude of our Government.

Their flamboyant utterances would have been at once set down to the credit of the adage, "In vino veritas," but for the fact that the banquet was presided over by the Reverend Doctor Tipple.

The astonishment of the country was subdued to serious reflection when the President gave his open and official approval to what was said by these high functionaries. In the part of his oration that is most important, Mr. Loomis said:

WHAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN.

Reflect for a moment on the grave possibilities which confronted the Government as it peered into the future and sought to provide intelligently for the many serious complications and contingencies which the President foresaw. If the revolution in Panama had not occurred; if the American people, guided by the opinions of its most learned, efficient, and highly trusted engineers, contended that the Nicaragua route was an impracticable one; if the people and Congress of this country had insisted that we wait for a year or until such time as the politicians at Bogota were ready to negotiate a new canal treaty and in the meantime their Congress had declared invalid the renewal of the French concession, which might have happened on the Isthmus; I may safely assert without fear of contradiction by any well-informed person that the Government of France would not have stood serenely by and witnessed the pillage of thousands of her people through the act which Bogota politicians devised for the looting of the French company of $40,000,000.

The moment that the cables flashed from Bogota to Paris the astounding news that the extension of the French concession was canceled a French squadron from Martinique would have borne down upon the Isthmus and, perhaps, landed marines at Colon and sent them across the Isthmus to Panama and along the line of the canal, to protect the interests and property of French citizens. There would in all probability have been an armed conflict between France and Colombia, or France at least would have felt herself compelled to hold the Isthmus for a long period. This would have wrought immediately and poignantly upon the sensibilities of the American people in respect to the Monroe doctrine, and we should no doubt have found ourselves viewing France with annoying apprehension. The French war ships might easily have been followed by those of England and Holland, and Panama, like the Balkan States, might well have been expected to furnish the spark to set half the world in flames.

What could have been the threatened situation at Panama that caused Loomis and Varilla to look back at what was so darkly ominous and to shudder at our narrow escape? It was the same that hurried our Atlantic and Pacific fleets to Panama and Colon with an array of naval power that was never before exhibited by the United States. It was the same that brought the fleet under Admiral Robley Evans to Hawaii from the Chinese station at a moment when our interests in Manchuria and all of China gave our commercial people great anxiety. It was the same that caused M. Thiebaud to assail the French Government with bitter reproaches, before an assembled multitude in Paris, for not having sent warships to Panama in advance of the uprising there.

It was the demand of the New Panama Canal Company, assisted by the compact set forth in the answer of M. Delcassé to an inquiry in the French Chamber of Deputies on the 27th of November, which I have just read, that caused this warlike commotion and alarmed the fears of the Administration.

France made these demands on Panama, and they were conceded before the Hay-Varilla treaty was signed in such hot haste on the 18th day of November, 1903. It was only four days later when M. Delcassé made his official statement to the Chamber of Deputies, which I have just read to the Senate, announcing the compact with Panama and acknowledging its independence.

The signing of the treaty was such an extraordinary affair that it gave to the country the amusing idea that it was an opera bouffe performance, in which M. Bunau-Varilla held the title rôle.

The newspapers brought out the fact that it was signed while Amador and Boyd, who were joint commissioners with Bunau-Varilla to negotiate it, were en route by rail from New York to Washington for that purpose. They had never seen the proposed treaty and could not have known its provisions, and they must have been within two hours' travel from Washington, on a fast express train, when the treaty was taken to Mr. Hay's sick room and was signed by him and Varilla, who met his co-commissioners at the depot and informed them of the great coup he had achieved.

They deeply resented the affront, but restrained their indignation. It was soon stated in the newspapers that Varilla's exaltation over this strategy was due to the realization of millions of dollars in a deal in Panama Canal securities by the announcement that the treaty had been signed—a fact that has not been denied, so far as I am informed. But this financial success, of which Mr. Hay was ignorant, had nothing to do with his part in this semitragic act.

He was influenced doubtless by the same emergent policy of the Administration that caused Assistant Secretary Darling, of the Navy, to send orders ahead of time to Panama to be on the lookout for "the uprising" and to repel any interference with it.

Haste was required to put the Panama "uprising" in possession of the governing power there and in Colon, but greater dispatch was needed to prevent France from intervening and to pacify her with the provisions of article 22 of the Hay-Varilla treaty, and Mr. Hay "accepted the situation."

Mr. Hay must have known the facts that Loomis afterwards gave forth in momentous oracles at the Quill Club banquet.

They were dark surmises that France was preparing to appear at Panama with war ships to contest with the United States the occupation of Panama and for the protection of French interests, and especially the interests of the New Panama Canal Company, and, finally, as an ultimatum, to demand the extension of the Wyse concession from 1904 to 1910, that had been conceived in fraud, sustained by war, in which we had given it aid, and nursed by Marroquin and kept alive by the blood of the people of Colombia.

The twenty-second article of this treaty and the compact between France and Panama secured these fruits of fraud and violence to the New Panama Canal Company and completed the triumph of Cromwell and Varilla. When it was signed he supposed that his triumph was complete, and our Government was in a more tranquil mood.

The fleets were dispersed and the United States guard at Panama went into camp to protect the Republic of Panama while the treaty should be matured in the Senatorial incubator, and Varilla and Loomis were permitted to explode their joy at the Quill Club banquet that we had escaped a war with France. It was not Colombia, it was France, that gave occasion for our grand display of naval power at Panama, and it is the surrender of the Administration to these demands of France, in article 22 of this treaty, that has suddenly ended our great war preparations, that included both the Army and the Navy in the projected military campaign at Panama.

The people could not take it seriously that all this war preparation was needed to protect Panama against Colombia, whose great General Reyes was in Washington suing for peace. They laughed at it as a political pageant, gotten up like the fight of Ransy Sniffle with the unseen foe, in Longstreet's Georgia Scenes.

They were mistaken. There was an enemy in sight; there was a casus belli; there was an ultimatum; there was a surrender and a capitulation, which is set forth in article 22 of the Hay-Varilla treaty.

Time was too short to admit of delay in the signature of the treaty on that fateful evening. France had to be placated and could not wait for the information even of the contemplated purchase of the property of the New Panama Canal Company. So it was postponed until a future time, but was safeguarded with a provision to which Panama assented, that our most important rights in Panama should not become absolute until the contemplated purchase of the things mentioned in article 22 is "consummated."

This article is as the apple of the eye to Cromwell, Varilla, and the pardoned felons of the New Panama Canal Company.

For one, I wish to know what it will cost us before I assist in its ratification. I am willing to assist in every movement, right or wrong in policy, to which the country is committed, even in pursuit of policies that my conscience can not approve, but I am not willing to join in a surrender to fraud and iniquity such as France requires us to accept in the twenty-second article of this treaty.

The wars of the Administration, even if they are wrong but have become unavoidable, demand my support as the bitter side of patriotic duty, but its surrenders to the New Panama Canal Company, on the demand of France, to avoid a threat of hostilities or the failure of a political exploit, is one thing I will not vote for.

I will now further identify M. Bunau-Varilla with the movement of the New Panama Canal Company by quoting an extract from his address at the Quill Club banquet.

He thus states the cause of the rejection by the Colombian Congress of the Hay-Herran treaty.

> It is known now that the cause of that rejection was the plan to twist the articles of that convention with the Panama Canal Company, in order to declare forfeited the concession and practically rob the French shareholders of their property. Thus, on November 1, when the Colombian Congress was closed, it had succeeded in violently insulting the United States; it had exhibited the unmistakable intention of blackmailing the French company out of its properties, and, finally, it had sacrificed the very elements of the existence of the people of the Isthmus by destroying the possibility of the construction of the canal.
> The result of these acts, which were virtually crimes, was to provoke on the Isthmus a revolution and throughout the whole world a feeling of indignation, which is shown by the fact that within thirty-five days after its birth the Republic was recognized and had entered into diplomatic relations with many of the nations of the earth.

Varilla and Cromwell have long been hunting in couples to destroy the Nicaragua Canal as the only means of foisting the property of the New Panama Canal Company on the United States.

To get credit for impartiality in what he calls a work for science he has affected to be in some sort the enemy of the New Panama Canal Company. If his enmity has any moral reason to support it, he has not alluded to it. If it is supported by any other reason, he can not assume, in the face of his public speeches, that a canal on that route is of doubtful success.

His alleged enmity to that company deceives no one, especially in the face of his diatribe against Colombia for endeavoring, as he says, to levy "blackmail" on that company.

In a lecture before the American Academy of Political and Social Science he says, among other accusations:

> But all was futile and in vain, and certainly the violent desire of appropriating, thanks to a twist in the interpretation of the contracts between the Panama Canal Company and the Republic of Colombia, the property of the French company was too strong for the Bogota politicians, and in closing up themselves in a fool's paradise they let the date of the 23d of September drop without having shown any disposition to comply with the requisites of vulgar courtesy toward the United States.
> MASTERFUL PIECE OF ROGUERY.
> Such a disposition of mind seems incredible, and we hesitate to think it possible that a nation can be represented by a legislative body who frames into law what is vulgarly known as criminal actions, blackmail, extortion, or conspiracy to obtain his neighbor's property fraudulently. There is not the slightest doubt, however, that it was so when we read the blackmailing bill of August 29, which is a public document; when we read another public document, official report, and a masterful piece of roguery, which the Bogota Congress heard before its dissolution at the end of October.
> In this report the commission concluded, in hypocritical terms, by the recommendation of upsetting the prolongation from 1904 to 1910 of the Panama Canal concession, to reimburse the 5,000,000 francs by which the prolongation had been paid, and thus to acquire for nothing the whole property of the canal company in order to deal with free hands with the Republic of the United States, with whom they thought a satisfactory deal of the stolen goods could be easily made, thanks to a little commission on the price of the $40,000,000.

This recalls the insolence of Genet, minister of France, but Genet criticised our Government for not responding in a sense of gratitude to France, while Varilla flatters the President, which makes all the difference. Washington dismissed Genet, while Roosevelt hugs Varilla to his bosom.

An enemy of the New Panama Canal Company would never have indulged in such violent criticisms of Colombia for claiming a fourth of the "blackmail" that he and Cromwell were trying to levy on the United States. It was an interested friend of the Panama Canal Company, whose pocket was threatened, that uttered these calumnies against Colombia.

He knew that the breach of all the contracts of that company ever made with Colombia had caused revolt and war in that Republic, and that the very demand that he was then pressing and is still urging for the extension of the Wyse concession from 1904 to 1910 was the cause of that war.

Colombia had waited for twenty-four years for the canal, under contracts with these French companies, and when they confessed their inability to complete the work, and, to avoid the forfeiture of their concessions, they were trying to close a "business arrangement" with the United States for the sale of property that had cost them less than $12,000,000 for the sum of $40,000,000, it was neither unjust nor in any sense improper that they should have been required to pay Colombia $10,000,000 of their winnings in a game that never had an equal in depravity.

They had inflicted upon Colombia a debt of $6,000,000 and the loss of 100,000 lives in their violation of the laws and constitution of that Republic in the subornation of Marroquin, and now they demand that Panama and the United States shall adopt and confirm that outrage in the ratification of this treaty under a threat of the displeasure of France.

That this person, while holding a diplomatic post near this Government, should be tolerated in the utterance of such abuse and imprecation toward an American Republic, whose minister was then recognized and residing at Washington, as Colombia's ministers have been received for three-quarters of a century, is far below the conceptions that the world has entertained of the dignity, sensibility, and honor of the grand Republic.

Now, no matter how little the extension of the concession from 1904 to 1910 is entitled to our respect, or what sacrifices of blood and money it has unjustly cost the people of Colombia, we take over the canal zone subject to the compact between France and Panama, as above set forth, and we confirm that concession.

I need not pause to denounce this intervention of France to control the construction of a canal through Panama. Every Senator who knows the history of Congress since 1880 will at once denounce this compact between France and Panama as being in contempt of the declarations of all our Presidents and Secretaries of State even further back than 1880 and of both Houses of Congress.

In this treaty we reverse and then expressly abandon this declared policy on the requirement of France and Panama.

I am not occupying the floor to-day to express any opinions of my own as to the propriety of the line of policy we are observing with reference to Panama or Colombia. My purpose is to lay before the Senate such matters in the history of these transactions as the known facts disclose and to obtain the information from the Government that will support or refute or will explain the true situation.

Before I enter upon the examination of the specific points of the inquiry made in this resolution, I will state, as briefly as possible, another result that is eagerly sought to be accomplished by the New Panama Canal Company, through the ratification of this treaty, as to which there must be some understanding that Congress should be informed about.

The fact I will now state is perfectly understood by the men who are exploiting this enterprise against our Treasury, and also for speculative purposes in the bonds and stocks of the old Panama Canal Company.

The ratification of this treaty will repeal every appropriation of money in the Spooner law for the construction of a canal on the Nicaragua route, which result is earnestly desired by some who claim that they are patriotic.

That result being accomplished, the New Panama Canal Company will have destroyed its only competitor, and with France at its back and with our President's determination to have a canal at Panama or else no canal anywhere, the whole subject of a canal will be relegated to the condition it was in after the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the whole controversy will have to be again fought over. In that battle the Nicaragua route can not participate, for this treaty kills it. This treaty will then force Congress to consummate this "contemplated purchase," at the peril of having no canal.

This repeal of all the canal appropriations, under the effect of this treaty, destroys all the work that has been accomplished toward the construction of any canal.

I have no censures, but great commiseration for those who will assist in this fatal movement. It is both needless and destructive. But I can not forbear again to call the attention of Congress to the terrible situation this treaty will create, and to implore the law-making power to reach forth a mighty arm and exert all its just powers to relieve the country from a blunder that will be felt through many generations.

I will now turn to the facts that involve the New Panama Canal Company in full and direct responsibility for the last paragraph in article 22 of the Hay-Varilla treaty. In doing this I will make statements that are based upon the correspondence in reputable public journals, as the President does, and will ask the Government, in answer to the resolution before the Senate, to affirm or deny these statements. It is thus stated, and I therefore so assert:

1. That M. Bunau-Varilla was active and persistent in arranging to bring about and to promote the secession of Panama from Colombia, and that this plan was agreed to between him and influential persons in the United States, and conferences were held between them in New York about the time it was ascertained that the Colombian Congress was opposed to the ratification of the Hay-Herran treaty.

2. That in the capacity of an engineer in the employ of the old Panama Canal Company, and then as a contractor, he acquired considerable wealth, and when that company failed he was largely interested in its bonded indebtedness and its property, or in stock of the company, and is now, or was when he was sent as minister from Panama, largely interested in the contemplated purchase of the property of the New Panama Canal Company, that is provided for in article 22 of the Hay-Varilla treaty.

3. That M. Bunau-Varilla, in announcing his appointment as minister from Panama to the President of the United States and in later official functions, proclaimed himself as the champion of the Panama Canal and felicitated himself that his new official duties so closely corresponded with his splendid career in the promotion of that canal.

This also includes his writings and his public lectures, directed especially to the destruction of the Nicaragua route.

While it is not surprising that M. Varilla, as minister from Panama, appointed by cable while he was in New York, should provide for his personal interests in negotiating and signing the Hay-Varilla treaty, particularly in article 22, it is surprising that he was considered a fit person to assist in making a treaty that was intended to become the supreme law of the United States and to bestow on him and his associates such money as they might be able to wring from the Treasury of the United States under a "contemplated contract," upon which our treaty rights are made to depend.

If a Member of Congress should make such a contract with any other person, to get money out of the Treasury of the United States in that way, he would not easily escape condign punishment.

He is not, in that matter, amenable to our laws, but, under the laws of nations, he is persona non grata. He is not a fit person.

I will not trace further the connection of M. Varilla with the revolt in Panama, as a conspirator, except to say that he is a citizen of France and had no patriotic reason for attempting to free himself from the alleged oppressions of Colombia toward its people.

His interest in contracts on the canal, out of which he had grown rich, and the glory of a new raid on the Treasury of the United States, and of crushing out his old foe—the Nicaragua Canal—was enough to make him frantic, and I do not criticise him for being in that condition. But I do insist that the Senate in looking into his powers to formulate and agree to supreme laws that most deeply affect and rule 80,000,000 of our people shall scrutinize them carefully and faithfully, especially in connection with article 22 of this treaty. That article provides for immense benefits to Varilla and his associates and enables them to bring all the other purposes of this treaty to naught if it is adopted.

In the relations he held to that movement and to the Panama Canal and to the money we are to pay for it and to this treaty, that compels the purchase of the property of the Panama Canal Company, old and new, and to the hurried negotiation and signing of this treaty that cut off the commissioners sent by Panama while they were en route by rail from New York to Washington, there is imperative reason why the Government should explain that transacti n to the people. I hope to furnish that opportunity in the answer to this resolution. The President has taken Varilla into his confidence, with these imputations upon him, and has thereby engendered suspicion as to the right of M. Varilla to sell to us the alleged property of the people of Panama. Upon information which our people accept as being true, it is denied that he had any lawful authority to sell 500 square miles of the land of Panama to the United States.

Leaving the other matters connected with the Panama secession out of view for the present, I will now present to the Senate some other reasons why the President should inform the country as to the particular matter of the contemplated purchase of the concessions and property of the New Panama Canal Company within the canal zone ceded to the United States, as I have shown, and the consummation of that purchase, as a condition on which our purchase of any right or property from Panama is to become absolute. Why were not the terms and cost of that purchase settled with the canal company before the treaty that binds us to it was signed? What was the cause of this reckless and incautious haste?

I believe that it was, first, to assure France that we would accept the terms she had already imposed on Panama as a condition of the recognition of her independence, and that we would provide for them in the treaty now before the Senate, and would even go higher in our bid for the property if the canal company should so require.

Before this treaty can be safely considered, I submit that it is the plain duty of the Government to inform the Senate of the state of facts as to this contemplated purchase.

This duty seems so clear and obvious that the plainest person can see it, and the most astute mind can not furnish a satisfactory reason for withholding this information from the Senate.

I need not dwell on this matter, for everybody must see the necessity for this information in advance of the final action of the Senate on this treaty.

In the Committee on Foreign Relations the examination of this treaty has been without any light on this matter. Members of that committee were denied the privilege of moving an amendment to strike out article 22 of that treaty, and this is the first time I have had the opportunity to present the facts and reasons to sustain that motion. The Senate is still without information from official sources as to anything that has been done or is expected to be done in making or consummating the "contemplated purchase" provided for in that article.

With whom is the President to make this "contemplated purchase" of the property and other things claimed by the New Panama Canal Company?

Eiffel was a contractor for the locks, and he subscribed 10,000,000 francs to the stock of the new company.

The Crédit Lyonnais was heavily interested in contracts for work on the canal. It subscribed 4,000,000 francs.

Artigue, Sonderegger & Co. were contractors on the Culebra cut. They subscribed 2,200,000 francs.

Baratoux, Letellier & Co. had the contract on the Pacific cut of about 10 miles.

The Isthmian Canal Commission, in their final report, say:

> All these contractors had engaged to complete the work intrusted to them before the close of the year 1889.

This group of defaulting contractors was compelled by public sentiment, and by the only hope of escape from heavy amercements in suits pending against them and, in some cases, of convictions for felonies—such as were made in the French courts against Ferdinand De Lesseps and his son Charles—to agree that they would complete the canal, changing De Lesseps's plan from a sea-level canal to a canal with locks.

The New Panama Canal Company was organized under this agreement, as is stated in the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, which I have already read to the Senate from pages 83 and 84 of their final report.

These are some of the most prominent despoilers of the old company, into whose hands this treaty delivers us, while France and Panama stand by to guarantee their demands on the United States.

But to make this statement more complete and accurate, and to show their breach of faith, I will copy the third section of article 5 of the agreement under which the New Panama Canal Company took over, without compensation, all the rights and property, of every kind, from the liquidator of the old company, under the orders of the French courts:

> Third. The rights of every nature in the Panama Railroad belonging to the estate in liquidation and contributed by M. Gautron under section 4 of this article shall become the property of the present company (the New Panama Canal Company) from and after the stockholders' meeting provided for by article 75 hereof without any pecuniary compensation, but upon the express condition that the canal be constructed within the time fixed by the agreement of concession. Upon default in completion within such time said rights shall revert to the estate in liquidation.

If, contrary to all expectation, the meeting in question should not take the necessary action for the completion of the canal, or if the course adopted by the meeting can not be carried out, the said rights in the railroad shall remain the property of the present company (the New Panama Railroad Company), but it shall pay into the estate in liquidation the sum of 20,000,000 francs by way of indemnity, and the share of profits set apart for the estate in liquidation shall be half the profits of the present company without other deductions than those provided in sections 2 and 3 of article 51 hereof.

Accordingly, said rights shall remain inalienable in the hands of the new company until either the payment of said sum of 20,000,000 francs or the entire completion of the canal.

These official facts show, in a light that is perfectly clear, first: That the New Panama Canal Company consists almost exclusively of men who had robbed the old company. Second, that those men had been coerced or induced by offers of pardon for these crimes, or by releases from judgments or liabilities to subscribe to the capital stock of the new company. Third, that they made the agreement with the court, to complete the canal, as I have above copied. Fourth, that Colombia was given 5,000,000 francs of paid-up stock in the new company as compensation for consenting to this arrangement. Fifth, that the company was organized by the payment of 60,000,000 francs or $12,000,000 cash subscriptions of stock into its treasury.

Sixth. I will now quote from the sworn statement of M. Edouard Lampre, the secretary of the New Panama Canal Company, when he testified as a witness before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, on the 11th day of January, 1902. I present this statement to prove that the subscribers to the stock of the New Panama Canal Company are men of wealth and are able, out of their private means and credit, to pay the $90,000,000 it was then estimated that it would cost to complete the canal, and that with the use of all the property of the old company, including the railroad stock and the control of the Panama Railroad, which was taken over by the New Panama Canal Company, they could have performed their contract to complete the canal, if that was possible.

M. Lampre's deposition is as follows: The questions asked him related generally to the letters to President McKinley and to Mr. Hay, and especially to the letter of Bonnardel, president of the board of directors, to the President of the United States, dated Paris, November 18, 1898, which I will place in the appendix to my remarks:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, M. Lampre, that letter to the President of the United States does not contain any proposition?

M. LAMPRE. No, not at that time; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Why was it written?

M. LAMPRE. Because to my recollection it was contemplated at the time that something ought to be done in the way of a reorganination of the company. It appeared at the time that the Nicaragua concession was under discussion that the rivalry of such a canal might be a great danger to the Panama Canal, and we thought at the time, as far as I can remember—it is rather old, it is three years ago—we thought at the time that we had to lay the whole subject before the President in order to ascertain and to see under what conditions we might, if necessary, Americanize our corporation and build the canal in partnership with the American interests. That is my recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. With the American Government?

M. LAMPRE. Well, I suppose private or public American interests. I think at the time it was contemplated to have a private corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. You had money enough then at hand or in prospect to build the canal?

M. LAMPRE. We had not in cash money enough.

The CHAIRMAN. You had good credit, though?

M. LAMPRE. Yes, I think we had; but still——

The CHAIRMAN. You were confident, then, that you could complete the canal?

M. LAMPRE. We were confident, but still, as you know, there was the rivalry of the Nicaragua Canal.

The CHAIRMAN. And it was the rivalry of the Nicaragua route that caused this paper to be printed?

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir; exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it argued at the time the letter was written that the United States was about to take or had taken action in favor of the Nicaragua route?

M. LAMPRE. I forget whether it was at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. We can ascertain that by a reference. Was this letter discussed and the authority given to send it to the President at a meeting of the board of directors of the new Panama Canal Company?

M. LAMPRE. Yes; it is in accordance with the resolution of the board.

The CHAIRMAN. The letter says that the board of directors is composed of gentlemen in an independent position?

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They must have been interested in and identified with large affairs in Paris?

M. LAMPRE. So they were, and are still at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. Of a financial character?

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it not the fact that the new board was composed of gentlemen who took over the property on speculation?

M. LAMPRE. At the time or now?

The CHAIRMAN. At the time it was consummated.

M. LAMPRE. For speculation? No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They took it over with the intention of completing the canal?

M. LAMPRE. Quite so. They were honest and straightforward in the intention. I must be positive on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. They are still able to do it, are they not?

M. LAMPRE. Oh, yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The French people are still able to do it?

M. LAMPRE. They might.

The CHAIRMAN. They paid the indemnity to Germany without any trouble, and we thought that the most marvelous act ever performed.

M. LAMPRE. I think we have enough cash in France.

The CHAIRMAN. You have plenty there to do it?

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Why are you trying to sell this canal enterprise for $40,000,000 when your people are able to build it and have so much involved in it?

M. LAMPRE. That is quite a different question, in my opinion. We have plenty of cash in France to build it, but the rivalry with the Nicaragua route and the possibility of the Congress of the United States passing a resolution for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal has frightened the people there, and so we thought it best to seek some kind of a combination here to build the canal, then with the assistance of the United States, and now to let the canal go to the United States if they will have it.

The CHAIRMAN. Your first proposition was to build the canal and realize out of it what you expected to do?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. That was your first idea?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the idea on which that letter was written?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, if you could not do that, to prevent the building of it on the Nicaragua route?

M. LAMPRE. We did not intend preventing anything, but we thought the Panama route, in our opinion, the best.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it not the purpose of this movement to compel the United States to build on your ground or not build at all?

M. LAMPRE. To compel?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

M. LAMPRE. We had no mind to compel anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not mean by force of arms.

M. LAMPRE. Our opinion was that the United States Government, or Congress, passing upon a resolution for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal would place us in great difficulty to raise the money in France. So we thought that we might as well lay the whole subject before the United States.

Senator MITCHELL. May I ask a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Senator MITCHELL. Suppose the United States should decline the offer which has been made by your company, and suppose, furthermore, Congress should go on and authorize the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, do you think that the Panama Canal would then be completed?

M. LAMPRE. It might be.

Senator MITCHELL. What is your best judgment on that point? What is your opinion?

M. LAMPRE. It might be. We might raise the money still in France.

The CHAIRMAN. Just in that connection I will ask you if you have made efforts to raise money in France to complete the canal?

M. LAMPRE. No; for we have no bondholders and not any bonded indebtedness at all.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not mean that. Have you asked for subscriptions?

M. LAMPRE. No; we have not.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not invited the French people to subscribe at all?

M. LAMPRE. No; we have not, because we thought it best, under the circumstances, not to go before the public, being given the possibility of the construction of the Nicaragua Canal by the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. In this letter to the President it is stated that the assets of the company exceed in value $100,000,000.

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That the property is free from incumbrance; that the title is unquestionable; that the company has no other debts than the monthly pay rolls; that it has no mortgages or bonded indebtedness, and its cash reserve is largely in excess of its actual needs.

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So this statement of the great strength and confidence of the Panama Canal Company was sent to the President to inspire him with like confidence in the success of the Panama Canal and to convince him and Congress and our people that it would be a fatal competition to the Nicaragua Canal.

M. LAMPRE. Well, I do not know, sir. I do not know what was at the time in the mind of the board. I can not answer that question. I do not know what they aimed at. I think it was only putting the whole subject before the President in the light in which it stood and showing how it stood.

The CHAIRMAN. Or was it the purpose then to prepare the United States to become the purchasers of the Panama Canal?

M. LAMPRE. At that time?

The CHAIRMAN. At that time.

M. LAMPRE. I do not know at the time what it was.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know when that idea originated?

M. LAMPRE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the actual purpose and object of the letter to the President of the United States and the letters and telegrams of Cromwell, attorney, given with the message of the President of February 20, 1902? What was the actual purpose and object of the letter to the President of the United States of the 18th day of November, 1898?

M. LAMPRE. As far as I can recollect, the purpose was to lay the whole subject before the United States; and at the time we stated that should the United States abandon the idea of constructing the Nicaragua Canal we were ready to reorganize under the laws of this country and to organize an American corporation to complete the Panama Canal, which we thought the best route and still think the best route. That is why we laid the whole subject before the United States at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. In addition to this cheerful picture of the resources of the company, these letters boast of the conciliation of Colombia, and that the entire feasibility and practicability of completing the canal is established by the members of two commissions who were the most distinguished men in their professions. Why did not a canal that was so well fortified in its appeal to public confidence obtain the money to complete it by subscriptions among the French people who had already sunk $250,000,000 in it and only had the ditch, the buildings, the machinery, and the material on hand to show for this expenditure?

M. LAMPRE. Just as I told you, Senator, on account of the contemplated building by the United States of the Nicaragua Canal.

They became so much afraid of the Nicaragua Canal that they dropped in their offer from $109,000,000 to $40,000,000 at a single bound.

Now, there is not a fact in these statements that can be disputed, except upon the hypothesis that the officers who made them had been guilty of falsehood.

What do they show?

The first answer is that this new company never had the honest purpose of keeping their contract to complete the canal. They had the ability to raise $90,000,000—their estimate for completing the canal with their private fortunes.

The second answer is that they confined the working capital of the new company to the $12,000,000 cash paid in by them, and never made even an effort to increase it by further sales of stock or by the issue and sale of bonds, and thereby prevented the possibility of completing the canal.

It had already cost the French people and the foreign stockholders and bondholders the sum of 1,329,693,074.74 francs, not including unpaid interest.

With interest included, this sum amounts to over 2,000,000,000 francs.

These figures are taken from the final report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, part 11, pages 21 and 22.

These expenditures have only left a trench in the earth, with no works of any kind except the plant. A great part of the ditch has filled up and, with the embankments, is to be again dug out and removed, if we build the canal there on our plan.

Now, a plainer or more conclusive statement of facts could not be made than is here presented to prove that the New Panama Canal Company never had the intention or expectation of completing the canal with the private resources of the stockholders or by any appeal to the French people for any assistance.

The story that they were frightened by the assistance proposed to be given to the Nicaragua Canal is a cheap invention in avoidance of the truth. As soon as the old company got to work, ten years before the new company was formed, the United States took up the construction of a canal at Nicaragua, with determined purpose to aid in its construction.

The subscribers to the stock of the New Panama Canal Company had fortified themselves against a possible loss of money in their agreement to complete the canal by two arrangements; first, by the extinguishment of all demands by the old company against them for their frauds and breaches of contract; and, second, by the arrangement made with the court, which I have already quoted, that the Panama Railroad should remain the property of the New Panama Canal Company, and should never revert to the liquidator of the old company in any event.

If the completion of the canal failed or should be abandoned the railroad was to remain "inalienable" in the hands of the new company on the payment of 20,000,000 francs, or $5,000,000, to the liquidator of the old company.

The stock in the railroad had cost the old company 93,286,186.73 francs, or $18,657,000. (See report of Isthmian Canal Commission, pt. 2, p. 23.)

Under this stipulation they get the railroad for really less than one-fourth its value.

Of the $40,000,000 to be paid by the United States, 40 per cent of which the French courts have already decreed to the New Panama Canal Company, they get $16,000,000, which is a profit of $4,000,000 on the $12,000,000 they paid for their stock in that company.

Besides this, the report of the auditors (commissaires) of the New Panama Canal Company, made on the 30th of December, 1903, shows that they still have in their treasury the sum of $2,000,000 remaining unexpended of the $12,000,000 capital stock originally paid into the treasury, and worked seven years with $10,000,000.

Besides this, they have had the net earnings of the railroad, which has not been less than 10 per cent per annum, on a capitalization of $15,000,000, which for the ten years the new company has had control of the railroad must amount to $1,500,000 in addition to betterments. In all, their net profits will be at least 50 per cent on their original investment. In Poor's Manual for 1900, pages 485–486, it is stated that the net earnings of the Panama Railroad were more than 35 per cent in 1899, and were even greater for the three preceding years.

Now we are confronted with the question, What has been the real policy of the New Panama Canal Company as to realizing this profit on their investment of $12,000,000 in the property of the old company?

It is demonstrated that it has not been to complete the canal. Their failure to put up the money to complete the canal, or to make an effort to get it, proves this fact conclusively. They never expected with $12,000,000 to complete the canal, two-fifths of which had already cost $200,000,000.

To get rid of the canal concessions and property at a profit to the stockholders in the New Panama Canal Company was left to them as a speculative margin on which it was their purpose to realize.

They had already secured themselves fully in the railroad deal with the court against any possible loss, and were fully equipped as a free lance to move against the United States as the only possible purchaser of their holdings.

It required a New York lawyer to work this purchase, and they found an experienced renovator of crippled corporations in Cromwell.

The liquidator of the old company had obtained from Colombia extensions of the canal concessions until October, 1904, and had paid for them out of the assets of the old company.

The first overture of the Panama Canal Company to the United States for a deal in the disposal of canal rights at Panama was made by M. Bonnardel, president of the board of directors of the New Panama Canal Company, dated November 18, 1898. I will insert this letter to President McKinley, with others I have referred to, in an appendix to my remarks. (See Appendix B.)

The next approach, ten days later, was by "William Nelson Cromwell, American counsel for the New Panama Canal Company."

This letter, dated November 28, 1898, I will read, as it is the first appearance of Mr. Cromwell on the stage, which, in his first act, he prepared to cover with the blood of civil war in Colombia:

Mr. Cromwell to Mr. Hay.

NEW YORK, November 28, 1898.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the interview which you accorded me on Friday last and to your gracious assurance that you would give audience to the director-general of the New Panama Canal Company and ourselves in connection with the presentation to the President of the communication which the New Panama Canal Company is about to make to the Government, I beg leave to advise you that by reason of the severe prevailing storm La Touraine was delayed in arrival until to-day, and that we shall, therefore, not be able to translate the documents and prepare them for presentation before Wednesday.

I will advise you further of our coming, keeping in mind the preference which you indicated, that the hour of conference be about 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

I have the honor, etc.,

WM. NELSON CROMWELL,
American Counsel for New Panama Canal Company.

His next appearance was on December 5, 1898, in a letter to Mr. Hay, in which he lifts the curtain and reveals the cause of the war which was then imminent in Colombia:

Mr. Cromwell to Mr. Hay.

NEW YORK, December 5, 1898.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg leave to confirm the telegram which I sent you at 10.45 this morning, as per inclosure.

Upon my return I learned through Director-General Hutin, who had preceded me to New York, that the measure which had just been acted on by one branch only of the Colombian Congress was a bill to authorize the Executive to negotiate the terms of and to conclude a further prorogation of six years from 1904 for the completion of the canal under the communication which the company had addressed to the Government, in the form of which I inclose you a translation.

You will note that the company specifically stated to the Government that the prorogation was not a matter of absolute necessity, but was desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation to enable even a deeper cut to be made, and which would reduce the number of locks to four, but which reduction would require more time than the plan adopted.

You will note that the bill proposed to confer power upon the Executive, and this happened to arise under extraordinary political conditions in Bogota. As you have probably been advised through official channels, a serious difference has recently been existing between the House of Representatives of Colombia and the President, the House having passed formal resolution declaring the office of President vacant and refusing to recognize the qualification of the President before the supreme court.

We therefore construe the action of the House of Representatives as only a part of the strife between the House and the President, and not a declaration of the policy of the nation or the Congress in respect of the Panama Canal, and as not evidencing hostility to the company itself. We are the more confirmed in this belief because of the uniform consideration and cordiality displayed by the Congress and the Government to the New Panama Canal Company, which, we have no doubt, their minister at Washington would fully confirm to you.

Our company has not the least apprehension regarding any prorogation of the concessions it may consider necessary in the future.

I have, etc., your obedient servant,

WM. NELSON CROMWELL,
Counsel, New Panama Canal Company.

It will be noticed that the letter of Bonnardel to the President is official and has been appended to it, "certified by the secretary of the company, Ed. Lampre," the same witness whose testimony I read a moment ago.

Lampre testified before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals in March, 1902, that this plan of operations was discussed and adopted by the board of directors of the New Panama Canal Company before Bonnardel, Hutin, and Cromwell began operations under it. M. Lampre testified as follows (p. 39 of hearings):

The CHAIRMAN. Was this letter [of Bonnardel] discussed and authority given to send it to the President at the meeting of the board of directors of the New Panama Canal Company?

M. LAMPRE. Yes; it is in accordance with the resolution of the board.

When the fact is considered that this action of the board of directors was taken at the very time that Mancini was forcing the decree of Sanclemente upon Colombia, at the cost of civil war, for an extension of the Wyse concession until 1910, which the Colombians had rejected, a terrible weight of crime falls upon that company that it can never expiate, and upon Cromwell, whose letter to Mr. Hay proves that he was watching every movement at Bogota with the eager attention of a lawyer who had set on foot the scheme to corrupt Sanclemente. The outbreak alarmed him only because he was afraid of its effect on President McKinley, and he at once began to hedge against it by false explanations.

Everything being thus prepared, the campaign in the United States was opened, the first point of attack being the Hepburn bill.

The fight was expected to be a long one and more time was needed to prevent Colombia from even forcing the forfeiture of the Wyse concession, thereby destroying all claim of the New Panama Canal Company to control that concession and to sell the property of the old canal company.

The situation was desperate and required desperate action. The last extension of the Wyse concession would expire on the 31st of October, 1904. Within that limit it was impossible to complete the canal and the time was too short for successful operations in dealing with the United States, so the forcing of the extension of the concession was a matter of necessity.

The people of Colombia determined that no further extension of time should be granted to the French company. They knew of the campaign inaugurated by the canal company to transfer their concessions and property to the United States in some form that would evade or violate the express prohibitions of the Wyse concession.

They knew that a plan existed for this purpose that was afterwards fully developed in a letter of Cromwell to the President of February 28, 1899, and of the official letter of M. Hutin to the President, dated March 11, 1899, which I will insert in the appendix to my remarks. (See appendix 3.) I respectfully invite their especial examination.

At the dates of these letters civil war was general and fierce in all the departments of Colombia, caused by the demands of the New Panama Canal Company.

The cool composure of these men in the discussion of the flattering prospects of this company in these mild and seductive letters to the President and Mr. Hay, when they knew what their attempted intrigue was costing the people of Colombia, is being repeated now to the disgust of all right-minded people in the intrigues that are dismembering Colombia.

These furtive schemes of Hutin and Cromwell were not successfully hidden from the Colombian people, and they were resented, especially by the Liberal party, with fierce indignation.

Sanclemente had been elected President and Marroquin Vice-President of Colombia by the Church party and were inaugurated in July, 1898.

The Congress of Colombia was then in session and continued until December 5 or 6, when they adjourned sine die and never met again.

The cause of that act of dissolution is given in the letter of Cromwell to Mr. Hay—dated New York, December 5, 1898—that I have just read to the Senate.

It is very remarkable that no official account of this important event has been sent to Congress besides that which is in Cromwell's letter, which was sent to the Senate in a message of the President of February 20, 1900, in response to a resolution of that body of January 23, 1900.

Earlier in the day of December 5, 1898, Cromwell had sent to Mr. Hay the following telegram:

NEW YORK, December 5, 1898.

Am writing you to-day concerning the cable from Consul-General Hart published Saturday. It is evident that the limited purpose and nature of the measure referred to is not fully reported from Bogota, and is given undue significance.

WM. NELSON CROMWELL,
Counsel, New Panama Canal Company.

The proposition of the New Panama Canal Company through Mancini for a prolongation of the concessions until 1910 is printed in the appendixes to my remarks. It is dated November 1, 1899.

In connection with it the canal company offered to pay the Colombian Government $1,000,000 French gold for six years' extension of time, from 1904 to 1910.

It was while that proposition was pending in the Colombian Congress that Bonnardel, Hutin, and Cromwell were earnestly at work to dispose of the rights, interests, and concessions that the canal company held in Colombia to the United States.

It is not worth while to pause for expressing any denunciations of this double dealing of the Panama Canal Company with Colombia. The bare statement of the facts condemns the men, in every honest bosom, as being perfidious. The motive was too overpowering to be resisted by them. It was to unload their canal property, given them by the old company, upon the United States.

Mr. Hart had informed our Government that the Congress of Colombia, after rejecting the proposed extension of the Wyse concession and declaring the office of President vacant, had adjourned sine die.

To meet this and to falsify the facts, Cromwell, in a letter to Mr. Hay, dated December 21, 1898, says:

Messrs. Sullivan & Cromwell to Mr. Hay.

NEW YORK, December 21, 1898.

MY DEAR SIR: Further to my letter of December 5, 1898, receipt of which was acknowledged by your favor of the 8th instant, I beg leave to say that we are advised by our counsel at Bogota that the official minutes of the session of the House of Representatives declare that the bill concerning the extension of the New Panama Canal Company has not been acted upon for lack of time. We, however, yesterday received further cable advising us that the Government had granted the extension subject to the approval of the next Congress, and I note from this morning's Herald that similar advices have been received by the press.

It is the opinion of the Government executives and of ourselves that power to give such extension is already located in the Government by the terms of the original concession; but the formality of ratification will be requested in due course, and of its being granted we have not the remotest apprehension.

You will thus see that my confidence in the attitude of Colombia, as indicated in my last note, has been fully and quickly confirmed.

Faithfully, yours,

WM. NELSON CROMWELL,
General Counsel, New Panama Canal Company.

He says that the official minutes of the House of Representatives declare that the bill concerning the extension of the concession of the New Panama Canal Company was not acted on for the lack of time. If any such minutes are on the records of that House of Representatives, the statement is false as to the cause of the defeat of the French offer of $1,000,000. It was rejected by Congress, and when Sanclemente gave it out that he would accept the money and make a decree granting the prolongation of the concession, the Congress regarded it as a high misdemeanor, declared his office vacant, and adjourned sine die.

This was Cromwell's strongest card in this game of chance. He could not expect the United States to intervene and take over a concession that had only five years to run, for it would be impossible to complete the canal in that length of time. If the time could not be extended the game was lost. Therefore, Cromwell, in his letter to Mr. Hay on the 5th of December, says:

Our company has not the least apprehension regarding any prorogation of its concessions it may consider necessary in the future.

And in his letter of the 21st of December he says:

It is the opinion of the Government executives and of ourselves that the power to give such extension is already located in the Government by the terms of the original concession; but the formality of ratification will be requested in due course, and of its being granted we have not the remotest apprehension.

All this was urged to reconcile our Government to the threatened unlawful purchase of the extension of the concession that was completed on the 28th of April, 1900, by the decree of Sanclemente, in despite of its rejection by the Congress of Colombia and the great convulsion that followed.

Soon after the Congress dissolved, after having expelled Sanclemente from office as President, civil war began in several of the Departments, and he seized the reins of Government as dictator and declared the entire Republic in a state of siege.

On the 23d day of April, 1900, the Liberal party issued its manifesto declaring the causes of war, and especially mentioned this deal with the New Panama Canal Company as a violation of the constitution and laws of Colombia, declaring the prolongation of the Wyse concession as a nullity and warning the nations against acting upon it.

Sanclemente, on the 28th day of April, 1900, made a decree accepting the $1,000,000 offered for the extension from 1904 to 1910 and granting the extension. No act of arbitrary power was ever more audacious or corrupt.

It was the insistence of the Liberals that this prolongation was void that caused the people of Colombia to resent the fact that Marroquin, without the consent of Congress, had negotiated the Hay-Herran treaty to dispose of the territory of Panama. M. Bunau-Varilla admits this fact.

The dispatches of Mr. Beaupré show that the people were violently opposed to the Hay-Herran treaty before the Congress met in June, 1903, and before they had accurate knowledge of its provisions.

They knew the despotic conduct of Sanclemente in prolonging the concession, and they resented it.

The civil war thus precipitated upon Colombia was a fearful ordeal of slaughter and destruction.

Marroquin succeeded Sanclemente in the Presidency soon after he had decreed the prolongation of the concessions, and prosecuted the civil war with terrible losses, but with relentless vigor.

Active hostilities reached Panama in the winter of 1901-2 and raged fiercely until November, 1902. Herrera, the really victorious leader of the Liberals, had Panama and Colon in easy reach of subjection, and was prevented by the active interference of the United States. The message of the President to the Senate on the 19th of March, 1902, leaves no doubt on that point.

"The stars in their courses," on our flag, "fought" for Marroquin, saved him his office, and made possible the ratification of the Hay-Herrán treaty, that had been negotiated while the civil war was flagrant and while he was dictator of Colombia.

The capitulati n of the victorious Herrera, signed on the 21st of November, 1902, stipulated for the election of a Congress for the consideration of "the negotiations relating to the Panama Canal." Thus Cromwell, who was ubiquitous, if not overpowering, in conducting those negotiations, had the Panama Canal Company placed in the f ont of the procession of events, l aving a trail of blood and desolation in his wake.

Nothing could be more clearly established by a comparison of known facts than the fact that the civil war in Colombia was occasioned by the demand of the New Panama Canal Company for a prolongation of the Wyse concession from 1904 to 1910, accompanied with the $1,000,000 paid to Sanclemente, and the rejection of that demand by the Congress of Colombia.

France or the New Panama Canal Company had the power to prevent that war by submitting to the laws and constitution of Colombia and to the vote of the Congress on the rejection of that offer. They preferred civil discord and the effusion of blood and the desolation of Colombia rather than that the Panama Canal Company should comply with its written obligation to complete the Panama Canal by the 30th of October, 1904, or else forfeit its charter under the terms of their agreement, which was enacted into a statute of that Republic.

If there had been any honest purpose to complete the canal according to contract, Colombia, having already extended the time for its completion for twelve years, would have granted any reasonable time for its completion.

The old and new companies have been engaged for twenty-four years in this work, and only claim now that two-fifths of it is accomplished. No possible complaint can be made that Colombia has not been generous in extending the Wyse concession.

But there was no honest purpose to complete the canal, and no effort by the New Panama Canal Company was made to obtain or supply more than $12,000,000 for that purpose, and at the very time that Mancini, the representative of the canal company at Bogota, was trying to get the extension from 1904 to 1910 Cromwell was in Washington trying to induce the United States to take it over.

The Hay-Varilla treaty requires the United States to purchase that extension from the canal company, Panama having expressly pledged itself to France that it should be confirmed and protected.

Thus Cromwell again heads the procession of events, and our banners in that august movement have "submission to fraud" for their motto, and flaunt out insult to the Liberals, living and dead, who fought this outrage for more than three years with heroic sufferings in Colombia.

In the present situation, as in that of 1898, the Panama Canal Company, whose whole history is frescoed with fraud and is a mere series of broken contracts that it never meant to keep, again thrusts itself into our treaty relations and is compelling the Senate to enact a supreme law of the United States that a "contemplated purchase" of its alleged property and claims shall be made by the United States and shall be "consummated" before we can get from Panama all that lawfully appertains to the canal zone, for which we are to pay her $10,000,000.

The present intrusion of the Panama Canal Company into our affairs, in the location and construction of a canal, is offensive and intolerable in the highest sense and even in the lowest sense.

In the highest sense it comes with the pledged support of Panama, given directly to France, that she has the treaty right, derived from Panama, to interfere with the terms and conditions on which the United States shall construct a canal at Panama. In the lowest sense it can be truly said that no nation was ever compelled by its own rulers to stoop so low.

There can be no possible mistake on this point or as to the facts, for they are official and of record.

Even those who shut their eyes to prevent seeing these facts are still compelled to feel them. They feel that there is in this treaty an atmosphere of national degradation at which the self-respect of the people revolts.

When they come to understand that it is a movement prompted by mercenary motive, that Panama never would have revolted against Colombia except to profit by the trade and increased price of property owned and controlled by a few wealthy men through the construction of a canal, and that the President would not have encouraged and assisted them except for the "contemplated" glory of being the founder of a canal and his view of the necessity of that location for it, the people will feel, and will not be slow to say, that this treaty is dishonoring to the country.

The New Panama Canal Company has never done an honest day's work toward the completion of the canal. As it has dug and removed earth from the Culebra Cut it has suffered the 20 miles dug by the old company between Bohio and Colon and the 7 miles between Miraflores and the Bay of Panama to silt up until an Indian canoe can not cross it at many places.

What work has been done was to keep alive the concessions in the hope of disposing of the property to the United States that was given to them by the old company and to escape forfeiture at the hands of Colombia.

It is a disgrace to our country that time will not efface and no financial success will ever excuse that we permit this Government to be coerced by such men and for such purposes into the ratification of article 22 of the Hay-Varilla treaty.

This is the highest sense in which this matter will be considered by those who will sit in judgment on our actions, and some may find excuse for us in the magnitude of the subject we are dealing with.

When they come to examine our work, in the lower sense of a voluntary and preferential advantage and profit extended by the United States to convicted culprits who have robbed their own people of the property they sell to us and will make a vast profit from their crimes—and we have placed the official facts on our records that establish their guilt—the people will not and should not be merciful in their censures.

What we should do in this matter is to strike out article 22 from this treaty and purchase the 10-mile zone and pay for it the price stipulated in the treaty. The property will come to us burdened with every just and rightful claim that affected it in law or equity when Panama belonged to Colombia, and we will concede and enforce those claims, rights, and equities as if the New Panama Canal Company were a corporation created, as the Panama Railroad Company is, under the laws of one of the States of the Union.

At the same time we will require that company to honestly keep and perform its obligations under its contracts. If any man can object to this as being unfair, let him state the grounds of such objection.

In cutting our Government loose from these treaty obligations of the most extraordinary and hitherto unheard of character, imposed on us by Panama—our creature and ward puling in the arms of its nurse—we will in some measure escape the odium of sustaining a conspiracy against Colombia, in which the agents at Panama of the New Panama Canal Company were the local leaders, and Bunau-Varilla was the chief conspirator. I am too anxious that the Senate should not be dragooned into this humiliating attitude to further explore the depths into which we will be driven.

It is better not to have described such a condition if we shall have the good fortune to escape it. If the President will give the Senate information of what he is doing or expects to do in making the contemplated purchase of the things mentioned in article 22 of the Hay-Varilla treaty, it may be that it will result in the elimination of the New Panama Canal Company from that treaty and the relief of our people from forced contact with the worst productions of the worst of scoundrels, that yet cause all France to shudder at the name of Panamist and the world to look with astonishment at our unworthy associates in this business.

I will not speak now of the second war with Colombia that the New Panama Canal Company has provoked, under the advice of the New York lawyer, as the surest way to realize its profits on the investment of $12,000,000 in its capital stock.

Most likely we will have leisure to repent of his leadership in the diplomacy that has brought about these conditions, and he will have leisure for the enjoyment of his fee that grows with the increase of our national distress and the deepening humiliation of Colombia; but I protest in the name of civilization that the Senate should not voluntarily and unnecessarily follow Cromwell in his provocation of a second war in Colombia to enable him to increase his bill of costs for such iniquities.

I will not now discuss other parts of the Hay-Varilla treaty that are not within the purview of the resolution before the Senate. I will, however, as in duty bound, refer to the recalcitrant spirit of the people with whom we are dealing in this matter.

There are not, all told, as many as 5 per cent of the inhabitants of Panama—and that is the outside limit of the people in that country—who can be rated as being qualified for self-government or the actual duties of citizenship in a free and independent republic.

Amendments have been recommended to be made to this treaty by the Committee on Foreign Relations that could not possibly have been so recommended but for the fact that they are indispensable to the future safety of our rights and the performance of our duties in Panama.

I have been notified that a motion to withdraw those amendments will be made, not because they are objectionable to Panama, but because the treaty if it is sent to the constitutional convention now sitting at Panama for the acceptance of any amendments to it will cause the possible rejection of some of its features or will create dissension in that body.

Such apprehensions, so readily yielded to, admonish us that the people we are dealing with must be approached with open avowals of our intentions and purposes in everything that relates to the government of a canal zone and the people living in its immediate neighborhood. And we must go there prepared to enforce our rights.

If the warmed viper, just hatched from the egg, so soon begins to warn us of its power to sting, we may well consider what will occur when swarms of them will be gathered in Panama from the lowest classes of all the peoples of the earth.

I have endeavored, through the kind indulgence of the Senate on this and other occasions, to state my views on most of the various questions that have arisen in the many years this great question has been before Congress and the people for discussion.

I do not recall any fact I have stated, except upon the highest authority, or any measure I have advocated that did not seem to be necessary for the advancement of the great result the people are so anxious to reach. The growth and expansion of our views in the atmosphere of constant discussion as to the full measure of our duty and of the great policy to be accomplished has, in my judgment, repaid all the delay and all the labor expended in our preliminary work. We do not seem yet to grasp the full scope of the great undertaking that is before us, or to be ready to lay hold of the possibilities of the future with the firm hand of faith.

In such a work there can be no room for injustice to any people, or for the humiliation of our people or country, or for the least real ground of distrust, or for mere political exploitation.

I have gone further than any of my colleagues in the Senate in the direction of gaining powers that are necessary and adequate for the actual work of constructing and operating an isthmian canal, yet I reach out for nothing that is not lawful.

Any mercenary appeal to anybody, for political or other reasons, that relies upon the base doctrine that the end justifies the means has no weight with any just man, nor will it make any impression on the people who have so long honored me with their confidence.

The South still holds its heroic attitude as a proud people, unbent by distress and unmoved by mercenary temptation. It still wears its baldric of honor undefiled over its bosom, jeweled with the love and fear of God.

The people of the old South, who stand for its past glory and will forever stand as the model of its future character, are true to their historic honors, as they are true to the blood in their veins.

That tide of life still flows as a benediction to the world, and will always flow uncorrupted through all the hearts that have claimed or will ever rightfully claim a share in the honorable heritage. It was bestowed on us by other hearts that are now still and pulseless. Yet their living example—like the light that is shut out by night, but comes again to-morrow—still lives and rules their day in supreme power.

The people of the South will pity and forgive, but will not forget, such as can find excuse in their fears of upstart despotism for the acceptance of gifts that are stained with fraud and are gathered from the wreck of the Constitution, the statutes enacted by Congress, and the laws of nations.

Whatever we have done in the most perilous actions of our people has been done in the effort to preserve rights that were guaranteed to us in the Constitution and by the laws of the land, and no true Southern heart repents or will ever repent the cost.

We can not, if we would, now convince those who live or those who will live that it is honorable or just or reputable to assist any man who may be President in the violation of the Constitution or the laws of the land.

We can not mark down the people of the South to the figure, in commercial politics, that accepts a favor of any party or any man as the price of its support of men who disregard laws and trample the rights of the weak under foot, or of measures that are wrong and dishonorable. We have never been robbers or faith breakers, and we will not lend our assistance to those who are.

There is nothing in this entire transaction that is complained of by the President, or that could be rationally complained of, besides the loss of an apparently good bargain. Take from the situation as it is described by the President in his annual message to Congress the supposed advantage of the bargain we were trying to make with Colombia and failed to complete, and there is nothing to justify his movement against Colombia, as it is stated in that message, or in any utterance from the Department of State. It is simply the seizure with armed power of the advantages we failed to obtain in the Hay-Herran treaty.

Our children and our children's children will scorn the thought that any sentiment but that of condemnation could be created in our bosoms by such unworthy considerations.

APPENDIX A.

[Confidential. Executive A, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session. December 16, 1903, made public.]

PANAMA CANAL.

Message from the President of the United States, transmitting a convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama for the construction of a ship canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, signed on November 18, 1903. December 8, 1903.—Read; convention read the first time and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and, together with the message, ordered to be printed in confidence for the use of the Senate.

To the Senate:

I transmit for the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification a convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama for the construction of a ship canal, etc., to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, signed on November 18, 1903.

I also inclose a report from the Secretary of State submitting the convention for my consideration.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, December 7, 1903.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President for his consideration, and, if his judgment approve thereof, for submission to the Senate, with a view to receiving the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, a convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama for the construction of a ship canal, etc., to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, signed by the respective plenipotentiaries of the two countries on November 18, 1903.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN HAY.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 19, 1903.

ISTHMIAN CANAL CONVENTION.

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama being desirous to insure the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the Congress of the United States of America having passed an act approved June 28, 1902, in furtherance of that object, by which the President of the United States is authorized to acquire within a reasonable time the control of the necessary territory of the Republic of Colombia, and the sovereignty of such territory being actually vested in the Republic of Panama, the high contracting parties have resolved for that purpose to conclude a convention, and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries—

The President of the United States of America, John Hay, Secretary of State, and

The Government of the Republic of Panama, Philippe Bunau-Varilla, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Republic of Panama, thereunto specially empowered by said Government, who, after communicating with each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The United States guarantees and will maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama.

ARTICLE II.

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles, extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed, the said zone beginning in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, with the proviso that the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors adjacent to said cities, which are included within the boundaries of the zone above described, shall not be included within this grant.

The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of any other lands and waters outside of the zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said enterprise.

The Republic of Panama further grants in like manner to the United States in perpetuity all islands within the limits of the zone above described and in addition thereto the group of small islands in the Bay of Panama, named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco.

ARTICLE III.

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in Article II of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said Article II which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

ARTICLE IV.

As rights subsidiary to the above grants the Republic of Panama grants in perpetuity to the United States the right to use the rivers, streams, lakes, and other bodies of water within its limits for navigation, the supply of water or water power, or other purposes, so far as the use of said rivers, streams, lakes, and bodies of water and the waters thereof may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal.

ARTICLE V.

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity a monopoly for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any system of communication by means of canal or railroad across its territory between the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean.

ARTICLE VI.

The grants herein contained shall in no manner invalidate the titles or rights of private land holders or owners of private property in the said zone or in or to any of the lands or waters granted to the United States by the provisions of any article of this treaty, nor shall they interfere with the rights of way over the public roads passing through the said zone or over any of the said lands or waters unless said rights of way or private rights shall conflict with rights herein granted to the United States, in which case the rights of the United States shall be superior.

All damages caused to the owners of private lands or private property of any kind by reason of the grants contained in this treaty or by reason of the operations of the United States, its agents or employees, or by reason of the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of the works of sanitation and protection herein provided for, shall be appraised and settled by a joint commission appointed by the Governments of the United States and of the Republic of Panama, whose decisions as to such damages shall be final, and whose awards as to such damages shall be paid solely by the United States. No part of the work on said canal or the Panama Railroad or on any auxiliary works relating thereto and authorized by the terms of this treaty shall be prevented, delayed, or impeded by or pending such proceedings to ascertain such damages. The appraisal of said private lands and private property and the assessment of damages to them shall be based upon their value before the date of this convention.

ARTICLE VII.

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States within the limits of the cities of Panama and Colon and their adjacent harbors and within the territory adjacent thereto the right to acquire, by purchase or by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, any lands, buildings, water rights, or other properties necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, and protection of the canal and of any works of sanitation, such as the collection and disposition of sewage and the distribution of water in the said cities of Panama and Colon, which, in the discretion of the United States may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal and railroad.

All such works of sanitation, collection, and disposition of sewage and distribution of water in the cities of Panama and Colon shall be made at the expense of the United States, and the Government of the United States, its agents or nominees, shall be authorized to impose and collect water rates and sewerage rates which shall be sufficient to provide for the payment of interest and the amortization of the principal of the cost of said works within a period of fifty years, and upon the expiration of said term of fifty years the system of sewers and waterworks shall revert to and become the properties of the cities of Panama and Colon, respectively, and the use of the water shall be free to the inhabitants of Panama and Colon, except to the extent that water rates may be necessary for the operation and maintenance of said system of sewers and waters.

The Republic of Panama agrees that the cities of Panama and Colon shall comply in perpetuity with the sanitary ordinances, whether of a preventive or curative character, prescribed by the United States, and in case the Government of Panama is unable or fails in its duty to enforce this compliance by the cities of Panama and Colon with the sanitary ordinances of the United States the Republic of Panama grants to the United States the right and authority to enforce the same.

The same right and authority are granted to the United States for the maintenance of public order in the cities of Panama and Colon and the territories and harbors adjacent thereto in case the Republic of Panama should not be, in the judgment of the United States, able to maintain such order.

ARTICLE VIII.

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all rights which it now has or hereafter may acquire to the property of the New Panama Canal Company and the Panama Railroad Company as a result of the transfer of sovereignty from the Republic of Colombia to the Republic of Panama over the Isthmus of Panama and authorizes the New Panama Canal Company to sell and transfer to the United States its rights, privileges, properties, and concessions, as well as the Panama Railroad, and all the shares, or part of the shares of that company; but the public lands situated outside of the zone described in Article II of this treaty, now included in the concessions to both said enterprises and not required in the construction or operation of the canal, shall revert to the Republic of Panama, except any property now owned by or in the possession of said companies within Panama or Colon or the ports or terminals thereof.

ARTICLE IX.

The United States agrees that the ports at either entrance of the canal and the waters thereof and the Republic of Panama agrees that the towns of Panama and Colon shall be free for all time, so that there shall not be imposed or collected custom-house tolls, tonnage, anchorage, light-house, wharf, pilot, or quarantine dues, or any other charges or taxes of any kind upon any vessel using or passing through the canal or belonging to or employed by the United States, directly or indirectly, in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the main canal, or auxiliary works, or upon the cargo, officers, crew, or passengers of any such vessels, except such tolls and charges as may be imposed by the United States for the use of the canal and other works, and except tolls and charges imposed by the Republic of Panama upon merchandise destined to be introduced for the consumption of the rest of the Republic of Panama, and upon vessels touching at the ports of Colon and Panama and which do not cross the canal.

The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to establish in such ports and in the towns of Panama and Colon such houses and guards as it may be necessary to collect duties on importations destined to other portions of Panama and to prevent contraband trade. The United States shall have the right to make use of the towns and harbors of Panama and Colon as places of anchorage, and for making repairs, for loading, unloading, depositing, or transshipping cargoes either in transit or destined for the service of the canal and for other works pertaining to the canal.

ARTICLE X.

The Republic of Panama agrees that there shall not be imposed any taxes, national, municipal, departmental, or of any other class, upon the canal, the railways and auxiliary works, tugs and other vessels employed in the service of the canal, storehouses, workshops, offices, quarters for laborers, factories of all kinds, warehouses, wharves, machinery and other works, property, and effects appertaining to the canal or railroad and auxiliary works, or their officers or employees, situated within the cities of Panama and Colon, and that there shall not be imposed contributions or charges of a personal character of any kind upon officers, employees, laborers, and other individuals in the service of the canal and railroad and auxiliary works.

ARTICLE XI.

The United States agrees that the official dispatches of the Government of the Republic of Panama shall be transmitted over any telegraph and telephone lines established for canal purposes and used for public and private business at rates not higher than those required from officials in the service of the United States.

ARTICLE XII.

The Government of the Republic of Panama shall permit the immigration and free access to the lands and workshops of the canal and its auxiliary works of all employees and workmen of whatever nationality under contract to work upon or seeking employment upon or in any wise connected with the said canal and its auxiliary works, with their respective families, and all such persons shall be free and exempt from the military service of the Republic of Panama.

ARTICLE XIII.

The United States may import at any time into the said zone and auxiliary lands, free of custom duties, imposts, taxes, or other charges, and without any restrictions, any and all vessels, dredges, engines, cars, machinery, tools, explosives, materials, supplies, and other articles necessary and convenient in the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the canal and auxiliary works, and all provisions, medicines, clothing, supplies, and other things necessary and convenient for the officers, employees, workmen, and laborers in the service and employ of the United States and for their families. If any such articles are disposed of for use outside of the zone and auxiliary lands granted to the United States and within the territory of the Republic, they shall be subject to the same import or other duties as like articles imported under the laws of the Republic of Panama.

ARTICLE XIV.

As the price or compensation for the rights, powers, and privileges granted in this convention by the Republic of Panama to the United States, the Government of the United States agrees to pay to the Republic of Panama the sum of $10,000,000 in gold coin of the United States on the exchange of the ratification of this convention, and also an annual payment during the life of this convention of $250,000 in like gold coin, beginning nine years after the date aforesaid.

The provisions of this article shall be in addition to all other benefits assured to the Republic of Panama under this convention.

But no delay or difference of opinion under this article or any other provisions of this treaty shall affect or interrupt the full operation and effect of this convention in all other respects.

ARTICLE XV.

The joint commission referred to in Article VI shall be established as follows:

The President of the United States shall nominate two persons and the President of the Republic of Panama shall nominate two persons and they shall proceed to a decision; but in case of disagreement of the commission (by reason of their being equally divided in conclusion) an umpire shall be appointed by the two Governments, who shall render the decision. In the event of the death, absence, or incapacity of a commissioner or umpire, or of his omitting, declining, or ceasing to act, his place shall be filled by the appointment of another person in the manner above indicated. All decisions by a majority of the commission or by the umpire shall be final.

ARTICLE XVI.

The two Governments shall make adequate provision by future agreement for the pursuit, capture, imprisonment, detention, and delivery within said zone and auxiliary lands to the authorities of the Republic of Panama of persons charged with the commitment of crimes, felonies, or misdemeanors without said zone, and for the pursuit, capture, imprisonment, detention, and delivery without said zone to the authorities of the United States of persons charged with the commitment of crimes, felonies, and misdemeanors within said zone and auxiliary lands.

ARTICLE XVII.

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States the use of all the ports of the Republic open to commerce as places of refuge for any vessels employed in the canal enterprise, and for all vessels passing or bound to pass through the canal which may be in distress and be driven to seek refuge in said ports. Such vessels shall be exempt from anchorage and tonnage dues on the part of the Republic of Panama.

ARTICLE XVIII.

The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of Article III of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

ARTICLE XIX.

The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind. The exemption is to be extended to the auxiliary railway for the transportation of persons in the service of the Republic of Panama, or of the police force charged with the preservation of public order outside of said zone, as well as to their baggage, munitions of war, and supplies.

ARTICLE XX.

If by virtue of any existing treaty in relation to the territory of the Isthmus of Panama, whereof the obligations shall descend or be assumed by the Republic of Panama, there may be any privilege or concession in favor of the Government or the citizens and subjects of a third power relative to an interoceanic means of communication which in any of its terms may be incompatible with the terms of the present convention, the Republic of Panama agrees to cancel or modify such treaty in due form, for which purpose it shall give to the said third power the requisite notification within the term of four months from the date of the present convention, and in case the existing treaty contains no clause permitting its modification or annulment, the Republic of Panama agrees to procure its modification or annulment in such form that there shall not exist any conflict with the stipulations of the present convention.

ARTICLE XXI.

The rights and privileges granted by the Republic of Panama to the United States in the preceding articles are understood to be free of all anterior debts, liens, trusts, or liabilities, or concessions or privileges to other governments, corporations, syndicates, or individuals, and consequently, if there should arise any claims on account of the present concessions and privileges or otherwise, the claimants shall resort to the Government of the Republic of Panama and not to the United States for any indemnity or compromise which may be required.

ARTICLE XXII.

The Republic of Panama renounces and grants to the United States the participation to which it might be entitled in the future earnings of the canal under Article XV of the concessionary contract with Lucien N. B. Wyse now owned by the New Panama Canal Company and any and all other rights or claims of a pecuniary nature arising under or relating to said concession, or arising under or relating to the concessions to the Panama Railroad Company or any extension or modification thereof; and it likewise renounces, confirms, and grants to the United States, now and hereafter, all the rights and property reserved in the said concessions which otherwise would belong to Panama at or before the expiration of the terms of ninety-nine years of the concessions granted to or held by the above-mentioned party and companies, and all right, title and interest which it now has or may hereafter have, in and to the lands, canal, works, property, and rights held by the said companies under said concessions or otherwise, and acquired or to be acquired by the United States from or through the New Panama Canal Company, including any property and rights which might or may in the future, either by lapse of time, forfeiture, or otherwise, revert to the Republic of Panama under any contracts or concessions, with said Wyse, the Universal Panama Canal Company, the Panama Railroad Company, and the New Panama Canal Company.

The aforesaid rights and property shall be and are free and released from any present or revisionary interest in or claims of Panama, and the title of the United States thereto, upon consummation of the contemplated purchase by the United States from the New Panama Canal Company, shall be absolute, so far as concerns the Republic of Panama, excepting always the rights of the Republic specifically secured under this treaty.

ARTICLE XXIII.

If it should become necessary at any time to employ armed forces for the safety or protection of the canal, or of the ships that make use of the same, or the railways and auxiliary works, the United States shall have the right, at all times and in its discretion, to use its police and its land and naval forces or to establish fortifications for these purposes.

ARTICLE XXIV.

No change either in the Government or in the laws and treaties of the Republic of Panama shall, without the consent of the United States, affect any right of the United States under the present convention or under any treaty stipulation between the two countries that now exists or may hereafter exist touching the subject-matter of this convention.

If the Republic of Panama shall hereafter enter as a constituent into any other government or into any union or confederation of states, so as to merge her sovereignty or independence in such government, union, or confederation, the rights of the United States under this convention shall not be in any respect lessened or impaired.

ARTICLE XXV.

For the better performance of the engagements of this convention and to the end of the efficient protection of the canal and the preservation of its neutrality, the Government of the Republic of Panama will sell or lease to the United States lands adequate and necessary for naval or coaling stations on the Pacific coast and on the western Caribbean coast of the Republic at certain points to be agreed upon with the President of the United States.

ARTICLE XXVI.

This convention when signed by the plenipotentiaries of the contracting parties shall be ratified by the respective Governments, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington at the earliest date possible.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention in duplicate and have hereunto affixed their respective seals.

Done at the city of Washington the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord, 1903.

APPENDIX B.

STATEMENT OF M. EDOUARD LAMPRE.

The CHAIRMAN. The old stockholders have interests, legal or equitable, in the property of the Panama Canal Company, the new company?

M. LAMPRE. I did not say the old stockholders, Senator. I said the bondholders. I said, in general words, the liquidation, because we have nothing to do with the individuals. The only thing we would have to do, if the canal were built, according to our charter, and profits were derived out of it, would be out of 100 francs to give 60 to the liquidator, and we have nothing whatever more to do with it. It is his own business and not ours.

The CHAIRMAN. That is your view of the law?

M. LAMPRE. It is my view. It is the general law, I may state. There can not be a mistake in France about that.

The CHAIRMAN. I will take the liberty of saying that there are mistakes made by lawyers very often. They are just as apt to be mistaken as others.

M. LAMPRE. I can admit that. I express an opinion on what I know to be truth in France, and of course I have nothing to say on the view here.

The CHAIRMAN. I doubt the correctness of your statement and must be permitted to take the general judgment about a matter of law of this kind.

M. LAMPRE. I understand the thing fully.

The CHAIRMAN. Why is it that your company is bound to pay to the liquidator for the benefit of the old stockholders anything, if you have no obligations?

M. LAMPRE. How is it?

The CHAIRMAN. How is it that the new company is bound to pay of the proceeds of the canal, when completed, any percentage to the liquidator of the old company, and through him to the stockholders of the old company, unless you have some responsibility fixed by law upon you?

M. LAMPRE. Not by the law, Senator, by what we call statutes, and you would call, I believe, charter. It includes an article of agreement between the liquidator and the new company, according to which that division of benefit has been agreed upon; that is to say, we agree that when the canal would be open to navigation and profits would be derived out of the operations—we agreed with the liquidator, under an article of agreement which is inserted in our by-laws, upon the division of profits, which I have just stated to you.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Is that 60 per cent a part of the consideration of the transfer?

M. LAMPRE. Sixty per cent? Yes; it was the consideration of the transfer.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Sixty per cent will be paid to the representative of the old company?

M. LAMPRE. We have nothing to do with what would be done with that 60 per cent. That is his business; none of ours. We agreed to give him 60 per cent and we have done with it all.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Was that the consideration or a part of the consideration?

M. LAMPRE. The whole consideration—the whole of it.

The CHAIRMAN. You say that this contract is incorporated in the by-laws of the new company?

M. LAMPRE. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. And is a part of it?

M. LAMPRE. Article 5.

The CHAIRMAN. Are those by-laws a part of your charter?

M. LAMPRE. We do not have charters in France.

The CHAIRMAN. I call it a charter.

M. LAMPRE. If you will call it a charter, it is the charter.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you call it?

M. LAMPRE. We call it statutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it incorporated there?

M. LAMPRE. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. And becomes a law you are bound to obey?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly; as it is an agreement between the liquidator and ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. It is as much a law as if it had been enacted in that form by the Parliament of France?

M. LAMPRE. Oh, it is an agreement that we must execute, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to get at the precise nature of it. Is it as much obligatory upon you to comply with that agreement as it would be if it had been enacted by the Parliament of France?

M. LAMPRE. It could never have been enacted by the Parliament of France. It is as binding as possible, if you will let me put it this way.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to know what is possible. Many things that look possible to you appear to me to be impossibilities.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Let me ask a question along that line. If your company now transfers to this Government this canal, will then this Government assume the obligation to pay the 60 per cent of the benefits?

M. LAMPRE. Not at all, sir; no. I must make this quite clear to the committee, if I can. You understand, of course, that this agreement with the liquidator I was just telling you about, inserted in what we call the statutes and what you are pleased to call the charter, might not apply to the present condition of things; that is to say, it might be claimed by the liquidator that any amount that we would get from the United States for the transfer would have to be divided between the liquidator and ourselves, under certain conditions not definite at the present time.

We claim, and we are right to claim, that we have, according to our statutes, according to the authority given us by the stockholders' meeting, full and complete power to deal with the United States for the transfer of this company's property. But as it has been contended in this country that if we were to deal with the United States Government the interference of the liquidator would absolutely be necessary, we thought it fit and useful to pass (and that was done recently with the liquidation of the old company) an agreement by which this liquidator, as far as he is concerned, and under the authority of the law and of the courts, gives the new company full, complete, and absolute power to deal alone, without his interference, with the United States for the transfer of the concessions and property and for the amount the company may think fit under the authority of this stockholders' meeting.

The only question that might have been left aside is as to how the amount which we might get from the United States would be divided between the new company and the old company, and that has been solved under the following conditions: That is to say that we (I mean the liquidator and our company) leave the whole thing to the judgment of an arbitration court, which has been agreed upon between the new company and the liquidator.

However, the question of division of the amount which we might get from the United States has, to my judgment, nothing to do with this country. It is only a matter to discuss and to put straight between the old company and ourselves. However, for your information, I am pleased to say that the subject has been settled, and has been decided to be submitted to a court of arbitration which we have agreed upon.

Senator MITCHELL. May I ask a question just at that point? Suppose the United States accept your offer and pay you $40,000,000, and then suppose there should be some failure of the arbitration proceedings which would result in the liquidator or those he represents not getting any portion of the $40,000,000. The United States having obtained the benefit of your property, would not these stockholders have an equitable claim against the United States, through the liquidator?

M. LAMPRE. No, sir; in no way whatever, because according to the terms of the agreement passed between us and the liquidator, and according, moreover, to the legal conditions in France of an arbitration, we, I mean the contracting parties, on the one side the liquidator and on the other side the new company, agree, positively agree, to accept as absolutely binding the decision of the arbitration.

Senator MITCHELL. The United States would have to run the risk of them carrying out that agreement with the liquidator?

M. LAMPRE. No; they would have to run no risk whatever, according to my opinion.

Senator MITCHELL. This is merely a subject of inquiry.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Let me see if I understand exactly the transaction between the old and the new company. I understand that the old company went into liquidation and a liquidator was appointed.

M. LAMPRE. Exactly.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Of course he represents the stockholders, creditors, and bondholders?

M. LAMPRE. That is right.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Representing these parties, he transferred all the right, title, interest, and property of the old concern to your company, and that was duly ratified and homologated by the judgment of the court?

M. LAMPRE. That is the whole subject, sir.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. As the consideration of the transfer, your company was to pay to the liquidator, representing the creditors, bondholders, stockholders, and shareholders, 60 per cent of the benefits of the canal?

M. LAMPRE. That is correct.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Then your company purposes to transfer all your right, title, and interest to this Government for, say, $40,000,000?

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Now, what guaranty will your company give, in the event of the purchase of the canal by this Government, that the 60 per cent of benefits which the old company was to derive as a consideration will not be a part of the obligation which this Government assumes?

M. LAMPRE. I understand the question.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. I tried to make it clear.

M. LAMPRE. The guaranty we will give is that very agreement I was just telling you about, according to which the liquidator and the old company accepts of the question to be settled, the division of the amount each might get to be settled by a board of arbitration. To my understanding, the division of the amount we might get from the United States has nothing to do with the United States itself. I beg pardón, if I am too crude.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. We think you are perfectly clear.

M. LAMPRE. It is a matter to be settled only and exclusively between the liquidator and our own company. It is settled under the present agreement.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Under your law has not any creditor or bondholder or any holder of stock the right to go into court and object to any settlement that the liquidator might make?

M. LAMPRE. The liquidator has authority.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. The liquidator, as I understand, has authority, or you have authority, to make this arbitration.

M. LAMPRE. He has authority from the court.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Under your law, does not his act require a homologation by the court?

M. LAMPRE. I understand your question, Senator. But that thing has been foreseen, and there is at the present time a judgment of the court giving the liquidator that very authority to enter upon that contract, agreement, with the new company, so that the thing is quite clear and certain now. He has got a special judgment, special authority and authorization from the court to enter upon a contract with us.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. To enter upon this arbitration?

M. LAMPRE. An arbitration contract, an agreement, under which we alone would have to deal with the United States.

Senator TURNER. What court is that?

M. LAMPRE. The French court.
Senator TURNER. What is the rank of the court? Is it a court of last resort or is its judgment subject to review by other courts?
M. LAMPRE. The first court.
Senator TURNER. A court of first instance?
M. LAMPRE. Exactly.
Senator TURNER. Then its judgment is subject to review if any stockholder wills to open it up?
M. LAMPRE. It might be; but I do not expect any trouble from that source.
Senator TURNER. Now, let me ask you this question: When you took this canal project over from the liquidator, was it a contract to complete the canal and operate it?
M. LAMPRE. Yes; that was the contract.
Senator TURNER. And to turn over to the old stockholders 60 per cent of the net proceeds?
M. LAMPRE. It was.
Senator TURNER. That was your contract?
M. LAMPRE. It was.
Senator TURNER. If the bonded indebtedness amounts to 800,000,000 francs or more, there would be none of this $40,000,000 to turn over to the old stockholders at all, that being the first lien, of course?
M. LAMPRE. This is how the thing stands: The stockholders, as I said——
Senator TURNER. The stockholders would be out and injured?
M. LAMPRE. That is a matter for the liquidator to decide.
Senator TURNER. Would they have a standing in some court to come in and say that the liquidator had no authority to contract to turn over this property to a foreign government and cut them out from the possibility of any benefits whatever from the construction and operation of this canal?
M. LAMPRE. Well, you know any claim may always be set forth, but I am convinced——
Senator TURNER. Is it not quite likely that they would urge a claim of that kind?
M. LAMPRE. It might happen, but I am convinced there would be no difficulty about it at all under these conditions.
Senator TURNER. What right would any court have, in justice and equity, to cut these old stockholders out of any possibility of any benefit?
M. LAMPRE. The law itself, sir; because it is the law in France that when a corporation fails the first interests in that corporation to satisfy are the interests of the bondholders. The stockholders, who are only associates, who are debtors to the bondholders, have no right to get anything unless the bondholders are completely disinterested.
Senator TURNER. I understand that; but having failed, the liquidator, in the interest of the stockholders as well as the bondholders, made this contract with the new company. Now, what right has any court to say to that liquidator, "You may make a contract which will cut these stockholders off from any possibility of any benefits whatever?"
M. LAMPRE. The law itself.
Senator TURNER. Does the law give them that right absolutely?
M. LAMPRE. Yes.
Senator TURNER. Without any compensation or consideration to them whatever?
M. LAMPRE. Quite so.
The CHAIRMAN. Colombia, I learn from these papers, holds stock in the Panama Canal Company?
M. LAMPRE. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. The old company and the new?
M. LAMPRE. Not the old company, the new company; and that is 50,000 shares, or 5,000,000 francs, as provided by extensions of the concession granted in the years 1890 and 1893, making the entire stock of the new company 65,000,000 francs.
The CHAIRMAN. It holds that in its own right as a government?
M. LAMPRE. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. How is a French court, under this law you speak of, going to deal with Colombia and cut her off from a benefit in this canal?
M. LAMPRE. The court can not cut her off in the amount which we might obtain. In the amount which we might get from the United States, Colombia would have its proportion as a shareholder of the new company.
The CHAIRMAN. Can a French court decree that Colombia shall receive her share of this sale for $40,000,000 after the bondholders are satisfied? Can it decree that she, as a stockholder, shall receive her share?
M. LAMPRE. I am afraid there is confusion there, Senator. We are speaking at the present time of the stock the Colombian Government owns in the new company.
The CHAIRMAN. Oh, either company.
M. LAMPRE. As concerns the new company, the same agreement, the same laws, binding all the stockholders, apply to the Colombian Government.
The CHAIRMAN. The question I want to get at is this. You seem to rely upon the power of the French court to confirm this sale that you make and to bind the liquidator, if he agrees to it, to an arbitration, and to bind the old stockholders through the liquidator. You seem to insist on that. Now, Colombia being a sovereign government and one of the stockholders of the old company, I want to know if a court of France can reach Colombia and compel her to abide by its decree?
M. LAMPRE. The court of France has nothing to do with the Colombian Government. Let me make myself clear on this subject. The Colombian Government being, as you know, a stockholder of our company, has at every meeting of the stockholders of our company a representative, who is to vote upon resolutions presented by the board of administration; and the Colombian Government has agreed, as a member of the meeting, to accept what we are about to do with the United States Government, if it is to be done. This has been passed upon by the representative of the Colombian Government in the stockholders' meeting.
The CHAIRMAN. Then, if I gather your idea correctly, the Colombian Government, because it is a stockholder in the Panama Canal Company, has given up her sovereign powers and has no other powers than those of any other stockholder?
M. LAMPRE. Its powers as a stockholder and the power derived from the concession.
The CHAIRMAN. And she is subject to the courts of France, to be disposed of as to her interests in this stock as if she were a citizen of France?
M. LAMPRE. I must insist on this point. We are not subject to the courts of France; and, moreover, the only authority that we have to apply to is the stockholders' meeting. The Colombian Government, being a stockholder and having a representative at the stockholders' meeting, has passed upon the resolution giving power to the company to negotiate a sale to the United States.
The CHAIRMAN. Now, you state that as being the action of the Colombian Government?
M. LAMPRE. I do.
The CHAIRMAN. Has that ever been communicated to the French Government?
M. LAMPRE. The French Government has nothing to do with it, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter of opinion which I will determine for myself. Has it ever been communicated to the Government of the United States?
M. LAMPRE. I do not know about that. No; I think not.
The CHAIRMAN. So, whether Colombia is interested as a sovereign or as a stockholder in this transaction, the interest of Colombia and her dealings with it have not been communicated to the Government of France?
M. LAMPRE. Not to my knowledge; because in this business the Colombian Government is only a stockholder, and, of course, is entitled to the rights put forth in the concession and in the by-laws.
The CHAIRMAN. What is this arbitration that you propose to have? What is it to cover?
M. LAMPRE. The division of the amount we may get—only that.
The CHAIRMAN. Whatever that may be?
M. LAMPRE. Whatever it may be.
The CHAIRMAN. Did you say that the court had passed an order?
M. LAMPRE. Yes; the court has given authority to the liquidator, a special authority, besides the general powers that the liquidator derives from the law and from the judgment by which he has been appointed. It has given him special authority to resort to an arbitration court upon the division of the property.
The CHAIRMAN. Has there been a judicial proceeding in that court?
M. LAMPRE. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. When was it had?
M. LAMPRE. August 2, 1901; last August; six months ago.
The CHAIRMAN. Was it based on the proposition to sell for $40,000,000?
M. LAMPRE. No price was mentioned. It was based on the comtemplated sale to the United States. The offer had not been made at the time.
The CHAIRMAN. The liquidator might arbitrate under the laws of France as to——
M. LAMPRE. As to the offer.
The CHAIRMAN. Let me put my question, please. The liquidator might arbitrate under the laws of France as to any amount of money that might be received under any trade or transaction with the United States out of the sale of this canal?
M. LAMPRE. That is the very thing.
The CHAIRMAN. That is the general order of the court?
M. LAMPRE. It is the special order.
The CHAIRMAN. Your proposition to sell for $40,000,000 has not, I understand, been acted on by the court?
M. LAMPRE. No; it has been acted on by the stockholders' meeting and agreed upon, under a special decree of the court, by the liquidator.
The CHAIRMAN. So the liquidator, as you describe it and as I understand it, has general authority to arbitrate with the new company as to any amount of money that may be received from the United States on a sale of the property at any time?
M. LAMPRE. Exactly so.
The CHAIRMAN. And that was done when?
M. LAMPRE. The decree of the court giving special authority and general authority is dated August 2, 1901, and the agreement between the liquidator and our company under such authority is dated December 24 of last year, 1901, after authority having been given us by the stockholders' meeting to enter upon negotiations with the United States under the condition of the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission.
The CHAIRMAN. Who were the parties to that last agreement?
M. LAMPRE. The liquidator and our company.
The CHAIRMAN. What is the name of the liquidator?
M. LAMPRE. Monsieur Gautron.
The CHAIRMAN. Have you with you a copy of that agreement?
M. LAMPRE. I have it not with me, but I expect it to reach this country very soon. I guess it will come with the letter to Admiral Walker.
The CHAIRMAN. Now, if I understand these terms, it is that the liquidator will enter into an arbitration under the laws of France for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of money that is due out of the $40,000,000, if received, to the stockholders whom he represents?
M. LAMPRE. Yes; the liquidation.
Senator MITCHELL. What tribunal, if any, is designated in the agreement as arbitrator?
The CHAIRMAN. Has this last agreement been assented to by any tribunal?
M. LAMPRE. The court has given authority to the liquidator.
The CHAIRMAN. No. Has this particular last agreement been assented to by any court?
M. LAMPRE. It has been assented to. Before it was made it was assented to.
The CHAIRMAN. It could not have been assented to before it was made.
M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. That is an impossibility.
M. LAMPRE. The terms of that decree are——
The CHAIRMAN. Since it has been signed?
M. LAMPRE. No; because there was no occasion for that, as the liquidator has received full authority.
Senator MITCHELL. I understood you to say that the court had authorized this agreement?
M. LAMPRE. It has.
The CHAIRMAN. That is your interpretation of it, but——
M. LAMPRE. It is a fact. I beg your pardon; it is quite a fact.
The CHAIRMAN. The authorization is based upon an entirely different set of facts.
M. LAMPRE. The court has given authority to the liquidator to enter into that particular agreement, and the liquidator has enterod into this agreement.
The CHAIRMAN. To divide the $40,000,000?
M. LAMPRE. To resort to an arbitration court as to the division of the amount, whatever it might be, that we might get from the United States.
The CHAIRMAN. And whenever it might be obtained?
M. LAMPRE. Whenever it might be obtained. There is no limitation.
The CHAIRMAN. The object of the Panama Canal Company, the new company, according to its by-laws, according to its charter, according to all of its professions here, was to build and complete that canal?
M. LAMPRE. It was.
The CHAIRMAN. Is that the present object?
M. LAMPRE. It is still the object; but, at the present time, the object is the sale or transfer to the United States. That is what we contemplate at the present time; but, this failing, of course the object of the company stands.
The CHAIRMAN. You know the internal workings of this company. When they set forth to form the new organization to build a lock canal instead of the old sea-level canal, was it or was it not the purpose of the company really to build a canal, or was it to make a show in regard to the property by which and through which they could sell it to somebody else?
M. LAMPRE. No, sir; the honest, clear, straightforward, and clean purpose was to build the canal.
The CHAIRMAN. This agreement, then, between the liquidator and the new company, and this judgment of the court transferring the property to them, was for that purpose, was it not?
M. LAMPRE. Yes; for that purpose.
The CHAIRMAN. Was there any purpose at that time, either expressed or implied or understood, that this new company was formed for the purpose of getting hold of that property to sell it to somebody else?

M. LAMPRE. No; the object of the company at that time was to complete the canal; but I must state that in the charters, or by-laws, as I would say, for private corporations it is always contemplated that at any time the corporation may sell out to anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. That is your judgment about it. I want to get at facts—just the square, naked facts.

M. LAMPRE. Will you please repeat the question?

The CHAIRMAN. We form our own judgment about what the facts amount to, and we try to do it properly and correctly. We have a right to our judgment upon the facts, not to accept yours absolutely.

M. LAMPRE. Oh, yes, I do not presume it.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, I want to know if it was the purpose of your company as you have stated it here.

M. LAMPRE. The purpose was to build the canal.

The CHAIRMAN. Have not these stockholders the right to say to the liquidator, "We have not put this property in your hands, and the court has not put it in your hands, for the purpose of traffic; but it has been put in your hands for the purpose of completing a great establishment, out of which we are to draw interest at 5 per cent upon these stocks from the date of their issue?"

M. LAMPRE. I understand the question thoroughly. But you see the liquidator is a party to the agreement which has been inserted in the by-laws. Moreover, the liquidator is a shareholder of the new company. Under these conditions, the liquidator acts upon the resolution passed by the stockholders' meeting. Moreover, there is no authority whatever which could prevent the stockholders' meeting to decide about what it can do. It is left exclusively and solely to the stockholders' meeting of the new company.

The CHAIRMAN. You will allow me to observe that on this side of the Atlantic universally the powers of a corporation are those that are expressed or necessarily implied in the law granting the privilege.

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, if the powers are not found there, expressed or necessarily implied, they do not exist.

M. LAMPRE. I understand the thing, but you will find an express power.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand you to go upon the idea (if I am incorrect about it you can correct me) that under the power of this charter and by-laws your corporation has a right to do anything with this property that it is not prohibited from doing.

M. LAMPRE. That is it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is your view?

M. LAMPRE. That is the very thing. That is the law under which we act.

The CHAIRMAN. That is so strange to us that we shall be obliged to take some time to consider it before we come to that conclusion.

M. LAMPRE. It is quite a different thing, I understand, in the United States.

Senator MITCHELL. You understand that there was this difference in the law heretofore?

M. LAMPRE. Yes; I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. So you claim now that you and your company have the right to sell this property to the United States because you are not prohibited from doing it?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Under that charter?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly; and we have the right to do it (that is what we claim) without even the assent or interference of the liquidator of the old company; but, to make things quite clear, we have got this agreement with him.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, then, that brings up some other considerations.

Senator KITTREDGE. What is the name of the court that rendered the judgment and authorized the agreement you have mentioned?

M. LAMPRE. It is called the "Tribunal Civil de la Seine." It is the civil tribunal of the Seine Department. That is in Paris, of course.

Senator KITTREDGE. What is the name of the court to which an appeal might be taken from such a judgment?

M. LAMPRE. The court of appeals.

Senator KITTREDGE. Where will we find the law conferring jurisdiction upon those courts to act as they have acted in this matter?

M. LAMPRE. You will find it in the general expressions of the law of July 24, 1867.

Senator KITTREDGE. In what code?

M. LAMPRE. The Commercial Code. It is the duty of the court, whatever court it is, to act upon any question that concerns liquidation and a particular corporation.

Senator TURNER. What principle of law authorized that court to render a decree cutting the stockholders of the old company out of the benefits of your contract with this liquidator for their benefit?

M. LAMPRE. I do not get the question quite well, Senator.

Senator TURNER. You contracted, as a part of your charter, I understand you to say, that you would build this canal and operate it and pay the liquidator for the benefit of the old company 60 per cent?

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

Senator TURNER. Now, if you sell out to the United States, of course you can not carry out that obligation to the old company or to the stockholders of the old company.

M. LAMPRE. No. I understand.

Senator TURNER. And there will be nothing to go to them. This contract with the liquidator relieves you of the obligation for the benefit of the stockholders of the old company?

M. LAMPRE. Yes; but we shall have to let them share in the amount we may obtain.

Senator TURNER. Now, I want to know what principle of law of France would authorize the liquidator to make a contract which would cut the old stockholders out from the benefits of the provisions of that contract.

M. LAMPRE. The general principle under which receiverships are organized.

Senator TURNER. Your company is not in the hands of a receiver, is it?

M. LAMPRE. No.

Senator TURNER. It is still operating?

M. LAMPRE. Still operating.

Senator TURNER. It is still obligated to carry out this contract made for the benefit of its stockholders?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly.

Senator TURNER. What right has this liquidator to relieve it of its obligation to the old stockholders?

M. LAMPRE. I would like to make it clear that the stockholders' meeting of corporations in France is the only authority to decide this business. The court has nothing to do, I wish it to be understood, if possible, with what we, the standing corporation, do. That is the business of the stockholders' meeting.

Senator TURNER. The stockholders of this new company have no right to relieve the new company of this obligation to the stockholders of the old company? They can not by a mere vote relieve themselves from the obligation of their contract?

M. LAMPRE. I do not see that. They can, indeed.

Senator TURNER. You predicate their right upon the action of your stockholders, the stockholders of the new company?

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

Senator TURNER. To contract with the liquidator for the benefit of the stockholders of the old company?

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

Senator TURNER. Now, the action of the stockholders of the new company can not relieve that company from that obligation?

M. LAMPRE. I understand the question itself, but you see I stated in the course of this hearing that we are guided solely and only by our charter, and the charter does not forbid in any way that we should make a transfer or sale of our rights to anybody whatever.

Senator TURNER. But I understood you to say that your charter did contain this contract with the liquidator?

M. LAMPRE. It does contain it.

Senator TURNER. Under which you were to construct this canal and operate it?

M. LAMPRE. The liquidator has authority to relieve us from that contract, and he has agreed to what has been just passed upon.

Senator TURNER. What I ask you is what principle of law authorizes this liquidator to relieve you of the obligation for the benefit of the old stockholders without securing anything to them?

M. LAMPRE. That is the business of the court to decide, and the court has decided it.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you had better make that clear, because I do not believe the Congress of the United States will want to join your company in inflicting an act of absolute injustice upon these old stockholders.

M. LAMPRE. I am quite willing to make it clear, as much as I can.

Senator HANNA. At the meeting did the old stockholders take any part in this agreement?

M. LAMPRE. The liquidator was present.

Senator HANNA. By what authority?

M. LAMPRE. By authority of the judge appointing him and by authority of the law itself, as well as for the reason that he is a large shareholder of the new company.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. What I am trying to reach are the real true facts of this transaction and what obligations this Government would assume in the event that it should accept your proposition.

M. LAMPRE. Nothing but to pay the price agreed upon, sir.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Your purchase of the rights and property of the old canal imposed upon you certain obligations. One of the obligations was to dig the canal, and the other was to pay 60 per cent of the benefits of the canal to the old company?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly so.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Now, you propose to transfer all of your right, title, and interest to this Government?

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. The general principle of law, as I understand it, is that this Government would then step into your position and assume your obligations. That, I believe, will be accepted as a general proposition of law.

M. LAMPRE. Yes; but——

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Now, how will your company relieve us of the obligation which you have assumed to the old stockholders? I understand that you say this will be done by an arbitration between your company and the liquidator, which arbitration will be finally acted upon and homologated by the court?

M. LAMPRE. I do not say that, sir. I beg your pardon. I say that at the present time we have full authority on the one part from our stockholders' meeting and on the other part from the liquidator, who is the representative of these interests we are speaking of in the old company, to deal directly, without any interference, with the United States Government and to sell our rights and property at any amount whatever. Moreover, the liquidator has agreed that the amount to be obtained from that sale would be divided according to the decision of an arbitration court which has been agreed upon. The names of the men have been agreed upon, and this is to be the only authority to decide as to what proportion is to be given to the liquidator and to our company.

The question of division, I must insist upon, has to my mind nothing to do with our dealings with the United States, and this agreement, covering the two, gives full power to the company to act as to the dealings with the United States. Second, the division of the amount to be obtained has been agreed upon by the court at the date of August 2, 1901, under a decree rendered by a court giving full authority to the liquidator to pass such an agreement.

Senator TURNER. Does that decree undertake to cut off the stockholders from pursuing your successor, as they would have a right to pursue you, to compel the performance of the contract by which you got title to the canal?

M. LAMPRE. I do not think that I understand the question. You mean about the 60 per cent?

Senator TURNER. No. Does that decree which you say authorized you to make this sale cut off——

M. LAMPRE. The rights of the liquidator?

Senator TURNER. The rights of the stockholders of the old company to insist that your company shall carry out the obligation which you undertook to carry out toward them? Does it specifically cut them off?

M. LAMPRE. It does not say so.

Senator TURNER. Then it is a question of judgment as to whether they would have a right not to be cut off if they should insist on it?

M. LAMPRE. You see, sir, our obligations were to give the liquidator 60 per cent out of the profits. We have no profits.

Senator TURNER. Your obligations were to construct the canal and give 60 per cent?

M. LAMPRE. Sixty per cent out of the profits when the canal would be completed; but in the present condition of affairs there is no profit to divide. There will be a fixed amount, whatever it may be, to be divided between the old company and ourselves; and that will be divided according to the decision of that arbitration court under the authority of the agreement passed between the liquidator of the old company and ourselves—an agreement passed under the authority of the court.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Suppose a majority of the stockholders and a majority of the creditors should come into court and oppose the ratification or homologation by the court of the action of the liquidator in this matter?

M. LAMPRE. In my opinion the court would do away very soon with such a claim, having given the authority.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. The liquidator represents the——

M. LAMPRE. He represents the whole of the interest.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Suppose the majority of the stockholders and the majority of the bondholders should come into court and say, "We think the liquidator has made a very bad bargain for us, and we oppose homologating the action of the liquidator," what would be the probable action of a judge in a case of that kind?

M. LAMPRE. In my opinion there would be no doubt as to the action of the court. It would confirm purely and simply the decree authorizing the liquidator to pass out that agreement with us and to settle the whole buisness.

The CHAIRMAN. Without reference to its justice?

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Without reference to the justice, the fairness, of it?

M. LAMPRE. Of course the court thought it fair when it gave the authority to the liquidator.

Senator KITTREDGE. Were those stockholders and creditors given an opportunity to be heard at the time the court authorized the making of this agreement?

M. LAMPRE. No, sir; because the liquidator is the representative, and he has the power to act.

Senator KITTREDGE. Then the liquidator had notice of the application for authority to make this agreement?

M. LAMPRE. He himself applied for that authority. He was the man who applied for the authority in the capacity of liquidator of the old company, representing the interests involved in that company.

Senator MITCHELL. You stated a moment ago that the names of the arbitrators had already been selected. I should like to know how many there are and who they are.

M. LAMPRE. There are four of them, who are to appoint a fifth as president. The names are the highest legal authorities in the court. One of them—there are two for the company—is M. DuBuit.

Senator MITCHELL. It is stipulated in the agreement between the liquidator and the new company that the decision of this board shall be final?

M. LAMPRE. It is, and it is legal. It is the law in France of arbitration.

Senator MITCHELL. Does it require a majority or the whole of the board to determine?

M. LAMPRE. Oh, no; a majority.

Senator MITCHELL. There would be under your law a review of the decision they might make?

M. LAMPRE. No; because any parties resorting to arbitration in France are at liberty to state that they agree that the decision of the arbitration court is final, and without any appeal whatever, and so has it been done.

Answering to the question just put me, the names of the gentlemen are the highest legal authorities in France, and three of them have been presidents of the bar association in the court of appeals of Paris. These are the names: M. DuBuit and M. Léon Devin, arbitrators for the company; M. Limbourg and M. Thieblin, arbitrators for the liquidation of the old company; and the fifth is to be M. Betolaud.

The CHAIRMAN. I will now resume the examination, if the other members of the subcommittee are ready.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, there is one question on this same line that I should like to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. If I understand the law correctly, it is about this, that where parties agree to enter into an arbitration, that arbitration as between them is final.

M. LAMPRE. It is.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. But in order to have binding force it must be submitted to the court.

M. LAMPRE. No, sir, no; it is final between the parties.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Where a liquidator is appointed?

M. LAMPRE. He has the authority to enter into that contract. He has it now. It has been given to him before he passed the agreement. He was entitled under a decree of the court to enter into an agreement to that effect.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Have the arbitrators acted on this matter?

M. LAMPRE. Not yet; they can not act before we know what we may get.

The CHAIRMAN. The case has not been presented to them yet?

M. LAMPRE. Not yet, to my knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. You have been speaking of the stockholders' meeting. I will take the last one. Who represented the stockholders of the old company at the last meeting?

M. LAMPRE. The liquidator, Mr. Gautron.

The CHAIRMAN. Is he recognized as being authorized to represent it?

M. LAMPRE. Oh, yes; it is in his powers. Moreover, he is a stockholder himself.

The CHAIRMAN. So the stockholders in the old company are stockholders in the new?

M. LAMPRE. Oh, no, sir; not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. How could they be there represented, unless they were stockholders?

M. LAMPRE. I do not get the question quite.

The CHAIRMAN. How could they be represented in the stockholders' meetings unless they were stockholders of the company?

M. LAMPRE. Oh, quite so. Mr. Gautron, as the liquidator of the old company, has subscribed in the stock of this company for the liquidation an amount, I believe, of 16,000,000 francs out of the 60,000,000 francs, and of course he appears at the stockholders' meeting not only as the representative of the old company but as shareholder in the new one.

The CHAIRMAN. Very good. He is a shareholder, then, for the benefit of the old stockholders?

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. So that they have in equity, to say the least of it, all of the rights of stockholders to be represented by their man, their liquidator?

M. LAMPRE. Yes; and they are represented by him.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they select the liquidator or did the court appoint him?

M. LAMPRE. The court appointed him.

The CHAIRMAN. The old stockholders had nothing to do with selecting him?

M. LAMPRE. No; nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. It was just taken into court and the court appointed a liquidator?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. And from that time forward he represents them and subscribes all their stock, no matter how much it amounts to?

M. LAMPRE. With the approval of the court.

The CHAIRMAN. I know; but he subscribes 16,000,000 francs out of the 60,000,000 francs, because he represents what on this side of the Atlantic we would call stockholders. On the other side I do not know what they are called.

M. LAMPRE. He is a stockholder because the liquidation is a stockholder.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, as trustee for the stockholder.

M. LAMPRE. Oh, no; we have no such thing. It is quite different.

The CHAIRMAN. The stock does not belong to the liquidator?

M. LAMPRE. No; it belongs to the interests he represents—the liquidation.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course. I think we understand that. He is there merely as their agent to represent them?

M. LAMPRE. Quite so, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. At the same time he is the agent of the law?

M. LAMPRE. Quite so.

The CHAIRMAN. Authorized to do it?

M. LAMPRE. Quite so.

Senator TURNER. How much money has the new company put into this enterprise?

M. LAMPRE. At the present time?

Senator TURNER. Yes.

M. LAMPRE. I think I stated at the beginning of this hearing that as far as I can recollect at the present time about 16,000,000 francs are left from 60,000,000 francs originally subscribed.

The CHAIRMAN. I expect to examine M. Lampre on that point. Do you mean the stock?

Senator TURNER. How much money has the company actually expended in the enterprise?

M. LAMPRE. The difference between 60,000,000 francs and the 16,000,000 francs; that is to say, assuming my figures to be correct, we would have expended 44,000,000 francs.

Senator TURNER. That is eight or nine million dollars. If the new company are to get 40 per cent of the $40,000,000, they would be making considerable money.

M. LAMPRE. I do not know what the percentage will be.

Senator TURNER. That is a matter for the arbitrators?

M. LAMPRE. That is so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Government of Colombia, as you stated, was one of the old stockholders?

M. LAMPRE. The Government of Colombia is a stockholder now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is she represented also by the liquidator?

M. LAMPRE. No; represented by a representative of the Colombian Government in the stockholders' meeting, appointed every time.

The CHAIRMAN. A director?

M. LAMPRE. Not a director; a diplomatic representative of Colombia.

The CHAIRMAN. Does he enter into the directors' meetings?

M. LAMPRE. There is one. There is a permanent representative of the Colombian Government at the meetings of the board, and he knew everything about what happened.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that representative enter into the stockholders' meeting?

M. LAMPRE. Yes; he does. He is present.

The CHAIRMAN. Is he living in France?

M. LAMPRE. He lives in Paris.

The CHAIRMAN. He is an agent appointed by the Colombian Goverment to represent them there, I suppose?

M. LAMPRE. Yes; and, moreover, at every stockholders' meeting the Colombian Government gives authority to this or to another representative to vote, to be present at the meeting, and to pass upon the resolutions.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, the Colombian Government being stockholder in the old company that we know has interests which are entirely separate and different from the balance of the stockholders of the old company——

M. LAMPRE. The Colombian Government is not a stockholder in the old company, but in the new.

The CHAIRMAN. You say the Colombian Government is not represented by the liquidator.

M. LAMPRE. No; not being a shareholder in the old company.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Colombian Government has this agent that you speak of to act with or be present at the meetings of the board of directors and managers?

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Has that agent a voice in the management?

M. LAMPRE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. No voice?

M. LAMPRE. No voice.

The CHAIRMAN. Like one of our Delegates here from a Territory, he can come and take a seat, but can not vote?

M. LAMPRE. I beg pardon; he has, according to the commission, all the rights belonging to the directors themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. Does he participate in the direction of the company?

M. LAMPRE. No; he does not participate in the direction of the company, but he is present at all the meetings if he chooses.

The CHAIRMAN. Does he vote?

M. LAMPRE. He votes if he chooses to vote.

The CHAIRMAN. As a director?

M. LAMPRE. As a director.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, have you any authority besides that which this man represents in the canal, that you have just stated, from the Government of Colombia by which that Government is bound to this proposition to sell for $40,000,000 and divide the proceeds by an arbitration?

M. LAMPRE. We have the authority of the Colombian minister here to enter upon negotiations with the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. You have?

M. LAMPRE. We have. That was given in May last.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a copy of that authority?

M. LAMPRE. No, sir; but certainly it can be had.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it an authority to make a specific contract or was it a general authority to enter into any arrangement you pleased?

M. LAMPRE. A general authority.

The CHAIRMAN. The $40,000,000 proposition has not been submitted to the Colombian Government?

M. LAMPRE. Not formally. I advised the Colombian minister here, but to my knowledge, unless it has been done from Paris, it is the only thing at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter between private gentlemen. That is not a governmental affair.

M. LAMPRE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, I observe that your concession from the Colombian Government, and all the right it has ever granted, and all the amendments that have been granted to it have been by act of Congress of Colombia?

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The paper, the contract itself, was signed by the authorities of the Colombian Government?

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And then that contract was embodied in and made a public statute of Colombia?

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. By an act of Congress?

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the Colombian Congress given you any authority to proceed to make this arrangement with us now?

M. LAMPRE. None at all; we could not ask them for it.

The CHAIRMAN. What authority could you possibly have from the Colombian Government, unless it came from an act of Congress, when the act of Congress forbade you to do it?

M. LAMPRE. It is the authority given us by the Colombian minister under his Government's authority.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all the authority you have?

M. LAMPRE. That is all we have at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a copy of that?

M. LAMPRE. I guess we have. It is printed in the report of the Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all the governmental authority that you have from Colombia?

M. LAMPRE. At the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. That is as deep into the subject as Colombia has ever gone?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly; to my knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. You have been before this Government from time to time with various propositions. I have here a message from the President of the United States which informs us of all of the communications that you have made up to this last one on the subject of this canal, sent to Congress by a message of the President, President McKinley, on the 20th day of February, 1900.

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are aware of the contents of that first proposition, signed by M. Bonnardel and countersigned by you?

M. LAMPRE. I should like to hear the words again, if you please, or to peruse them.

The CHAIRMAN. It is quite an extensive document.

M. LAMPRE. As far as I recollect it was a proposal as to a partnership with the United States Government. Is not that the case?

The CHAIRMAN. No; you had not advanced to a partnership then. It is as follows:

"PARIS, November 18, 1898.

"To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

"SIR: The New Panama Canal Company believes it to be its duty to respectfully submit the following statement:

"It is common knowledge that in 1889 the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique de Panama, the old company, fell into financial difficulties after about one-third of the canal had been finished. The rights of that company then passed judicial administration. A liquidator (receiver) was appointed by the judgment of the civil tribunal of the Seine under date of the 4th of February, 1889. During his administration (1889-1894) and with the authorization of the court, the greatest care was taken to preserve and maintain the work already done"—

I wish to call your attention to that—

"and a prolongation was obtained from the Republic of Colombia of the time stipulated for the completion of the canal, thus preserving the rights of the company under its concession in their entirety.

"In view of the advanced state of the work on the canal, and the considerable sum (at least $150,000,000) actually expended for canal work properly so called, and for installations and plant, the logical conclusion followed that the very large capital invested would be protected through a reorganization of the affairs which took place successfully in the month of October, 1894. At that time and with this object in view the undersigned company was organized under the general laws of France. The company is a commercial association, formed exclusively upon private capital, and has no connection, alliance, or relation whatever with any government, except the relations established by the concessions which it holds from the Republic of Colombia. The board of directors of the company is an entirely new board, and composed of gentlemen of independent positions, having no official relation with the old Panama Company, and for the most part identified with large financial and commercial enterprises.

"Pursuant to judicial sale, authorized by the court as aforesaid, the undersigned company in 1894 became the sole owner of all the canal works, plant, material, concessions, and other property of the old company. The title of the undersigned to this property is therefore unquestionable, and has been officially recognized by the Government of Colombia.

"Surveys had been made by the old company, but the new company, while making use of them, would not be bound by their conclusions. The board of directors resolved at the start to examine and study anew all the questions involved, making use of the most recent improvements in material and of the advances made in engineering.

"It is needless for us to enumerate the difficulties and enormous expense involved in the choice of a definite plan for the execution of this work, which is one of the greatest undertakings of our time.

"Different plans, equally practicable but varying in probable cost, have been studied. Many months have been spent in preparing, studying, and revising them. This work has not been done hastily and superficially. Engineers chosen specially for their professional ability have studied the question in all its details—technical, climatic, physical, geologic, and economic.

"Though the skill of its own technical staff is worthy of the highest confidence, the undersigned company, out of abundant caution and in order to place beyond criticism the final conclusions, caused to be appointed an international technical commission, composed of engineers selected from different nationalities, a course which assures to the company the benefit of the widest possible experience, the severest judgment, and the most independent conclusions. The international technical commission is composed as follows"—

Giving the names of these gentlemen, among whom is General Abbot, United States Engineer Corps, the only American, except Mr. Soss, who died.

Mr. LAMPRE. I beg pardon; I believe there was another American, Mr. Fteley, of New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I beg pardon. After the names the communication proceeds:

"As to all statistical and economic questions, the new company established a special commission, presided over by M. Paul Leroy-Beaulieu, the eminent economist and a member of the Institute of France.

"It is certain that the members of these two commissions are the most distinguished and able men in their professions. No one of them would compromise his reputation and his honor, acquired by a long life of eminent services, by formulating conclusions upon unfounded, incomplete, superficial, or uncertain information.

"By the closest study of the subject; by actual inspection of the works of the canal, made by several of its members; by full discussion, and by frequent exchange of views; by subjecting every problem to the critical judgment of all, thus obtaining the most varied opinions; by all the methods and with all the care which the most advanced technical experience could suggest, this eminent commission of engineers has reached a unanimous conclusion, which has been officially communicated to this company, and upon which this company is pursuing the work of construction. These conclusions, signed by every member of the commission, establish the entire feasibility and practicability of completing the canal.

"We do not doubt that you will be interested to learn the essential features of our plans, which have been prepared with so much labor and care and confirmed by four years of continuous study.

"1. The old company had already substituted for the proposed sea-level canal a system of locks."

I call your attention to the fact that you have abandoned the old sea-level canal.

"This principle, with important modifications and improvements, has been adopted by the new company.

"2. The length of the canal from ocean to ocean is 46 miles.

"3. The locks will not exceed four on each slope of the divide; all locks will have a rock foundation, and all will have double lock chambers.

"4. There is nothing in the physical conditions on the Isthmus to prevent a change from a canal with a system of locks to a sea-level canal should the latter seem desirable in the future.

"5. The time of passage from ocean to ocean will be less than a day.

"6. The harbors situated at either extremity (Panama and Colon) are not artificial harbors; they are natural harbors, safe and satisfactory, needing but slight improvement. This fact is known to all the world, thanks to commerce, which for almost fifty years has made use of the Panama route (the Panama Railroad).

"7. Two-fifths of the work on the canal has been actually constructed; the remaining three-fifths is in a fair way of completion. During the last four years three or four thousand workmen, on an average, have been employed in working on the canal.

"8. The company's concessions are unquestionable. The Republic of Colombia has given to the enterprise its cordial and sincere cooperation.

"9. The existence and operation of the railroad, long established on the proposed line of the canal, greatly facilitates its construction.

"10. No construction is planned which is not fully justified by practical experience.

"Formerly the greatest difficulties were:

"(a) The control of the floods of the Chagres River; and

"(b) The excavation of the Culebra Cut.

"The manner in which each of these difficulties is to be surmounted is shown with the greatest detail in the report of the technical commission, which we have the honor to present to you.

"The condition of the new company is equally satisfactory. Its assets, including the work actually done on the canal, the buildings, the machinery, the material on hand, exceed in value 500,000,000 francs, or $100,000,000, which valuation has been made by a special commission, of which the former director of the National Academy of Roads and Bridges of France was chairman. The company has no mortgage or bonded indebtedness."

I suppose that means the new company?

M. LAMPRE. That is true; yes.

The CHAIRMAN (reading):

"The property is free from all incumbrance. The company has no other debts than monthly pay rolls. Its cash reserve is largely in excess of its actual needs.

"The undersigned company also invites your attention to the provisions of its concession, particularly articles 5 and 6, which reserve all rights to the Government of the United States secured by the treaty with the Republic of Colombia signed in 1846 and ratified in 1848.

"We have the honor to be, your obedient servants,

"J. BONNARDEL,

"The President of the Board of Directors.

"Certified by the secretary of the company.

"ED. LAMPRE."

It seems to be countersigned by you. Then Mr. Cromwell, who was the attorney, or so signs himself——

M. LAMPRE. He was the attorney.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cromwell, counsel for the company, writes to Mr. Hay on the 28th day of November, 1898, and refers to an interview which Mr. Hay had accorded him last Friday, and says:

"By reason of the severe prevailing storm La Touraine was delayed in arrival until to-day, and we shall therefore not be able to translate the documents and prepare them for presentation before Wednesday."

That, of course, referred to the engineer's report?

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then Mr. Cromwell telegraphs to Mr. Hay on the 5th day of December, 1898, as follows:

"Am writing you to-day concerning the cable from Consul-General Hart published Saturday. It is evident that the limited purpose and nature of the measure referred to is not fully reported from Bogota, and is given undue significance."

That was a disturbance, of course, in the Government down there; such a one as is going on there now.

There are several other communications which I will have copied for insertion at this point. It is unnecessary that they should be referred to now particularly.

The letters referred to are as follows:

"NEW YORK, December 5, 1898.

"MY DEAR SIR: I beg leave to confirm the telegram which I sent you at 10.45 this morning, as per inclosure.

"Upon my return I learned through Director-General Hutin, who had preceded me to New York, that the measure which had just been acted on by one branch only of the Colombian Congress was a bill to authorize the executive to negotiate the terms of and to conclude a further prorogation of six years from 1904 for the completion of the canal, under a communication which the company had addressed to the Government in the form of which I inclose you a translation.

"You will note that the company specifically stated to the Government that the prorogation was not a matter of absolute necessity, but was desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation to enable an even deeper cut to be made (and which would reduce the number of locks to four, but which reduction would of course require more time than the plan adopted).

"You will note that the bill proposed to confer power upon the executive, and this happened to arise under extraordinary political conditions in Bogota. As you have probably been advised through official channels, a serious difference has recently been existing between the House of Representatives of Colombia and the President, the House having passed formal resolution declaring the office of President vacant and refusing to recognize the qualifications of the President before the supreme court.

"We therefore construe the action of the House of Representatives as only a part of the strife between the House and the President, and not a declaration of the policy of the nation or the Congress in respect of the Panama Canal, and as not evidencing hostility to the company itself. We are the more confirmed in this belief because of the uniform consideration and cordiality displayed by the Congress and the Government to the New Panama Canal Company, which we have no doubt their minister at Washington would fully confirm to you.

"Our company has not the least apprehension regarding any prorogation of its concessions it may consider necessary in the future.

"I have, etc., your obedient servant,

"WM. NELSON CROMWELL,

"Counsel New Panama Canal Company."

[Inclosure in letter of Mr. Cromwell to Mr. Hay, December 5, 1898.]

"To the Seigneurle, Dr. P. A. MOLINA,

"Minister of Finance of the Republic of Colombia, Bogota:

"Alexander Napoleon Mancini, representative to the Government of Colombia of the New Panama Canal Company, has the honor to reply to your excellency and to explain the following, viz:

"At the time of the prorogation accorded in 1896 there was in view the completion of the canal in accordance with the plan as established by the technical commission, which plan determined the lowest level of the divide to be between 35 and 30 meters below the sea level.

"The studies made by the new company show that it will be of great advantage to make the cut deeper, and such work will naturally require a longer time.

"It is not necessary to call urgent attention to the fact that the Colombian Government itself has the greatest interest to facilitate the completion of the canal affording the best possible conditions for navigation and commerce.

"There is no doubt that the interests of Colombia are closely identified with those of the canal company and that the future of this nation depends in part upon the success of the works of the canal at Panama; and it is admitted that in order to provide in a very complete manner the increasing necessities of navigation and commerce it becomes doubly important to deepen the cut of the central mass below 25 meters. The plan of completion of the canal as prepared by the company, with the aid of its technical commission, suggests the idea to the canal management of deepening the cut to about 10 meters. Therefore the time of completion of the canal, which is at the end of 1904, becomes insufficient for the completion of said important work, and the company could not without serious risk of miscalculation affirm that the canal with such modification can be completed within the said time, and the company considers that it is proper to ask a prorogation of six years from 1904, so that it may complete the canal in the condition above mentioned.

"All that precedes is not of absolute necessity. The company can if necessary make the cut at 25 meters, for instance, as heretofore calculated, and in that case a further prorogation will not be absolutely necessary. But on the other hand, the company considers, as said above, that the deepening of the cut to about 10 meters will give much better results in respect to the operation of the canal.

"The Colombian Government can not fail to realize the importance of the purpose above explained and of the interest attached to a prorogation. Consequently, and in consideration of the considerable advantages which will inure to general commerce from the opening of the canal, the undersigned solicits, in the name of the New Panama Canal Company, a prorogation of six years for the completion of the canal, and is confident that the Government of the Republic will accord such extension of time under the best possible conditions.

"The company relies upon the kind cooperation of the Colombian Government, which has such great interest in the work, to facilitate the completion of such work.

"The undersigned does not need to recall to your excellency that during the past four years the company has constructed works of such great importance that they have attracted the attention and approbation of all competent people who have visited the Isthmus.

"I have, etc.,

"A. MANCINI,

"Representative of the New Panama Canal Company.

"BOGOTA, November 1, 1898."

"NEW YORK, December 21, 1898.

"MY DEAR SIR: Further to my letter of December 5, 1898, receipt of which was acknowledged by your favor of the 8th instant, I beg leave to say that we are advised by our counsel at Bogota that the official minutes of the session of the House of Representatives declares that the bill concerning the extension of the New Panama Canal Company has not been acted upon for lack of time. We, however, yesterday received further cable advising us that the Government had granted the extension subject to the approval of the next Congress, and I note from this morning's Herald that similar advices have been received by the press.

"It is the opinion of the Government executives and of ourselves that power to give such extension is already located in the Government by the terms of the original concession; but the formality of ratification will be requested in due course, and of its being granted we have not the remotest apprehension.

"You will thus see that my confidence in the attitude of Colombia, as indicated in my last note, has been fully and quickly confirmed.

"Faithfully, yours,

"WM. NELSON CROMWELL,

"NEW YORK, December 21, 1898.

"SIR: In addition to the certified copy of the official report of the International Technical Commission, which I had the honor of delivering to you on the 2d instant as a part of the communication of the company addressed to the President under date of November 18, 1898, I now have the honor of handing you a copy of an additional report made November 19, 1898, by Messrs. Zurcher and Bertrand, eminent engineers of France, upon the cut of the Culebra and the Emperador mountains.

"The report of the International Technical Commission, as well as the inclosure, being part of our official communication to the President, are for your official files and use. I merely mention this that you may not courteously consider them confidential.

"I have the honor, etc.,

"M. HUTIN,

"Director-General of the New Panama Canal Company."

APPENDIX C.

Mr. Hutin and Messrs. Sullivan & Cromwell to the President.

NEW YORK, February 28, 1899.

SIR: 1. The New Panama Canal Company has never proposed and does not seek any appropriation of financial aid from the Government of the United States in the completion of its canal.

2. It places its canal works on the Isthmus of Panama subject to the examination of this Government or any special commission through whom it may be desired to make such examination, and will facilitate in every possible way any such desire of the Government.

3. The Government will find that fully two-fifths of the canal works are already constructed; that continuously during the past four years from 3,000 to 4,000 men, under a large force of engineers, have been and are now actually engaged upon its works; that all technical and physical problems have been solved by the eminent "International Engineering Commission," whose report of November 18 last is before you; that the canal is undoubtedly feasible and the harbors at both ends natural harbors and entirely satisfactory; that its concessions are perfect and unquestioned, and that the relations of the United States to the canal are especial and superior by reason of the "special and remarkable advantages" secured to it by the treaty of 1846 between the United States and Colombia, and which rights, whatever they may be, were scrupulously respected, observed, and confirmed in the concessions of Colombia to the Panama Canal Company, under which the canal is being completed.

4. While the New Panama Canal Company does not seek any financial aid from the Government, it recognizes the national sentiment in favor of acquiring some pecuniary interest in any canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. Therefore the New Panama Canal Company declares that if, as the result of any such investigation, the Government of the United States adopts the Panama route, the company, if the Government so desires, will reincorporate under the laws of the State of New York (under the laws of which State the Panama Railroad Company has existed for nearly fifty years) or of some other State of the Union, subject to the provisions of its concession, and vest its concessions and property in such corporation. It will also in such event accord to the United States such representation in its board of directors, and such opportunity to acquire an interest in its securities, as may be permitted by its concessions, which, of course, must be scrupulously observed.

And further, if the United States should desire to perpetuate or enlarge its existing rights and privileges, acquired under said treaty of 1846, the company will conform to such supplemental treaty as may be entered into between the United States and Colombia.

We beg leave to say that yesterday, at a public hearing accorded us by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, we submitted to the chairman and gentlemen of that committee a communication to the foregoing purport, and have the honor to be,

Your obedient servants,

MAURICE HUTIN,
Director-General of the New Panama Canal Company.
SULLIVAN & CROMWELL,
General Counsel, New York City.

Mr. Hutin to the President.

COMPAGNIE NOUVELLE DU CANAL DE PANAMA,
45 Wall street, New York City, March 11, 1899.

To the PRESIDENT:

Referring to the act of Congress approved on the 4th instant respecting an investigation of the Panama and Nicaragua canals, the New Panama Canal Company, as one of the subjects of the inquiry, respectfully invites attention to its communication addressed to you December 2, 1898, and to its subsequent offers to the honorable Secretary of State, and, finally, to its official proposition of February 27 last, all of which contain the proffer and urgent invitation that the President or Congress make the fullest investigation of the canal works, plans, seven concessions, and status of the New Panama Company; and it also refers to the official report upon the canal made by the International Technical Commission November 16, 1898, and placed in your hands by us on December 2 last.

The said act of Congress is therefore in full accord with our repeated offers and our warmest desires.

We again most respectfully renew our proffer of the fullest investigation and our offer of all the facilities to that end. But the subject is of such transcendent consequence to the United States, to the people of the world as well as to ourselves, that we venture, with due respect, to submit this our petition that any commission designated to aid you in making the investigation and comparison contemplated by the act of Congress be composed of gentlemen of the widest experience, of exceptionable character and unquestionable professional standing, and who are not embarrassed by public committals or previous records favorable or unfavorable to either one or the other project, and who have not heretofore served upon any canal commission.

The New Panama Canal Company does not present or suggest any name for membership of any commission. Its only petition is that the selection be of gentlemen whose conclusion will at once command public confidence, fully relying upon its ability to satisfy fair and impartial investigation of the merits of its canal.

THE NEW PANAMA CANAL COMPANY,
By MAURICE HUTIN, Director-General.
SULLIVAN & CROMWELL, General Counsel.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 540) providing for an additional officer in the district of Chicago, in the collection district of Indiana and Illinois; and

A bill (S. 2795) to amend an act entitled "An act for the regulation of the practice of dentistry in the District of Columbia, and for the protection of the people from empiricism in relation thereto," approved June 6, 1892.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 10418) to ratify and amend an agreement with the Sioux tribe of Indians, of the Rosebud Reservation, in South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect; and

A bill (H. R. 10954) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

RELATIONS WITH COLOMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the resolution submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution No. 82, by Mr. BACON, favoring the negotiation by the President of a treaty with Colombia for the adjustment of all differences between the United States and that country growing out of the recent revolution in Panama.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I had intended earlier in the day to address the Senate upon the Panama question, but the hour is so far advanced that I shall defer my remarks until to-morrow or some other more convenient occasion.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator desire to retain the floor for that purpose?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I do not particularly desire to do so. I have no doubt I can arrange to get the floor in the morning. If there is any question about that, however, I will take it now.

Mr. CULLOM. I was going to suggest that there are several Senators who desire to speak to-morrow, and I should have been glad if the Senator could have gone on this evening.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Then I will take the floor now, and submit what I desire to say to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is the unfinished business, and would not come up until 2 o'clock; but by request it can be taken up immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Then I will say that to-morrow, after the routine morning business, I shall take the floor.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER DAM AT SAUK RAPIDS, MINN.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2818) permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River at or near the village of Sauk Rapids, Benton County, Minn.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, in section 1, line 16, after the words "That the," to insert "dam shall be so constructed that the;" in line 18, after the word "connection," to strike out the words "with said dam" and insert "therewith;" and on page 3, line 2, after the word "navigation," to insert "And provided further, That suitable fishways, to be approved by the United States Fish Commission, shall be constructed and maintained at said dam by the Sauk Rapids Water Power Company, its successors or assigns;" so as to make the section read:

That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Sauk Rapids Water Power Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Minnesota, its successors and assigns, to build a dam across the Mississippi River at or near the Sauk Rapids, so called, in said river, and at or near the village of Sauk Rapids, Benton County, Minn., for the development of water power, and such works and structures in connection therewith as may be necessary or convenient in the development of said power and in the utilization of the power thereby developed: Provided, That the plans for the construction of said dam and appurtenant works shall be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before the commencement of the construction of the same: And provided further, That the said Sauk Rapids Water Power Company, its successors or assigns, shall not deviate from such plans after such approval, either before or after the completion of said structures, unless the modification of said plans shall have previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and of the Secretary of War: And provided further, That there shall be placed and maintained in connection with said dam a sluiceway so arranged as to permit logs, timber, and lumber to pass around, through, or over said dam without unreasonable delay or hindrance and without toll or charges: And provided further, That the dam shall be so constructed that the Government of the United States may at any time construct in connection therewith a suitable lock for navigation purposes, and may at any time, without compensation, control the said dam so far as shall be necessary for purposes of navigation, but shall not destroy the water power developed by said dam and structures to any greater extent than may be necessary to provide proper facilities for navigation, and that the Secretary of War may at any time require and enforce, at the expense of the owners, such modifications and changes in the construction of such dam as he may deem advisable in the interests of navigation: And provided further, That suitable fishways, to be approved by the United States Fish Commission, shall be constructed and maintained at said dam by the Sauk Rapids Water Power Company, its successors or assigns.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, section 2, line 11, after the name "United States," to insert:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers or to exempt said structures from the operation of same.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That in case any litigation arises from the building of said dam, or from the obstruction of said river by said dam or appurtenant works, cases may be tried in the proper courts, as now provided for that purpose in the State of Minnesota, and in the courts of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers or to exempt said structures from the operation of same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEBRASKA SENATORIAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed to inquire into certain charges affecting the Hon. CHARLES H. DIETRICH, a Senator from the State of Nebraska, be authorized to employ a clerk and stenographer and, by themselves or any subcommittee of their number, to sit during the sessions of the Senate, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 10418) to ratify and amend an agreement with the Sioux tribe of Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, in South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 10954) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 2, 1904, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 1, 1904.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

SIOUX TRIBE OF INDIANS, SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, upon Saturday when the House adjourned the bill H. R. 10418 was before the House for consideration and the motion for the previous question was pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks the previous question.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAKER. I have here, Mr. Speaker, a copy of the Washington Post of this day, giving what purports to be a statement of the action of this House in which I was concerned two days ago.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE. I desire to inquire if, upon motion for the previous question, it is in order for the gentleman to raise the question of personal privilege?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York was on his feet demanding recognition of the Chair, and had announced to the House that he raised the question of personal privilege when the gentleman rose and made his motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from New York did at one time get upon his feet for a question of personal privilege, but the gentleman from Minnesota had already been recognized for a question of privilege, and he could not take the gentleman from Minnesota off his feet. Then the gentleman from South Dakota, before the gentleman from New York addressed the Chair again, moved the previous question. But it may or may not be that this is such a question as would be in order at this time. The Chair can not determine until he hears what it is.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from South Dakota did not raise the question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. That is unnecessary to discuss now.

Mr. BAKER. This article in the Post, Mr. Speaker, contains several misstatements of fact. I desire to have my position made clear upon the matter.

The SPEAKER. Does it affect the gentleman's standing as a Member of the House or his condition as a Member of the House?

Mr. BAKER. It does.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's rights or reputation?

Mr. BAKER. My reputation, Mr. Speaker. I desire to have the Clerk read the article.

The Clerk read as follows:

Republican Members of the House will now be able to sleep o' nights. Representative BAKER, of New York, no longer will haunt their dreams. His anger has been placated and his ferocity has subsided. He has withdrawn his threat that no Republican Member shall have unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD remarks begun on the floor of the House.

A week or so ago Mr. BAKER wanted to make a speech, but the man in charge of the Democratic time could not give him as many minutes as he required. When the allotted minutes were exhausted, he asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Some one on the Republican side objected. This aroused Mr. BAKER'S ire, and he served public notice that henceforth he would object whenever a member on the Republican side asked unanimous consent to extend remarks.

But Saturday Mr. BAKER made another speech, and again found himself short of time. He asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks, and no objection was offered. The embargo on extended Republican speeches, therefore, is lifted.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is hardly a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, the RECORD distinctly shows that I did not use the word "Republican."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

SIOUX TRIBE OF INDIANS, SOUTH DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the regular order. The regular order is the motion for the previous question demanded by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURKE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF CONNELL V. HOWELL.

Mr. McLAIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present the report of the minority of the Committee on Elections No. 3 in the case of William Connell v. George Howell, from the Tenth Congressional district of Pennsylvania, and ask that the same be printed.

The SPEAKER. It will be referred to the House Calendar.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE COMMISSION.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries may file the views of the minority on the bill (H. R. 7056) creating a commission to consider and recommend legislation for development of the American merchant marine, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the minority of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries may present its views on the bill H. R. 7056. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TO REGULATE PRACTICE OF DENTISTRY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2795) to amend an act for the regulation of the practice of dentistry in the District of Columbia, and for the protection of the people from empiricism in relation thereto, and ask unanimous consent that a similar House bill (H. R. 8327) lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress entitled "An act for the regulation of the practice of dentistry in the District of Columbia, and for the protection of the people from empiricism in relation thereto," approved June 6, 1892, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of the proviso in section 3 of said act and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That the board of dental examiners may issue a license to practice to any dentist who shall have been in legal practice for a period of five years or more, upon the certificate of the board of dental examiners of the State or Territory in which he practiced, certifying his competency and moral character, and upon the payment of the certification fee without examination as to his qualifications."

The bill was considered and read a third time.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask if it is now in order to offer an amendment to this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the bill is not amendable at this time.

Mr. GRIGGS. Then I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], if the bill applies to anything except the District of Columbia?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] for the presentation of an amendment?

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield for the reading of the proposed amendment, not for its being offered, until I know what it is. I want to say that all of the dentists in the District have come together and agreed on this proposition, so that there is no opposition to it whatever.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the amendment may be read for the information of the House.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the conclusion of the bill the following:

"And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall apply to students who are regularly matriculated in dental colleges in the District of Columbia, who at the time of such matriculation required only a three years' course of study, the certificate to be issued in such cases after graduation and without examination as to qualifications, upon the payment of the certificate fee."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Speaker, before that question is taken I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be read again for information. I am informed that it applies to the Territories as well as to the District of Columbia, and I have not yet heard it read. I see no objection to it so far as the Territory of New Mexico is concerned.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the bill.

The question being taken, the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Senate bill with provisions duplicating those of this bill will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

BONDS ON CONTRACTS.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for consideration of the bill (H. R. 7869) in relation to bonds on contracts with the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in all cases where the Commissioners of the District of Columbia enter into contracts for work or material they shall require good and sufficient bonds to the United States in a penal sum sufficient, in their judgment, to secure the strict and faithful performance of said contracts to the satisfaction of and acceptance by said Commissioners, and guaranteeing that the contractors shall keep new pavements or other new works in repair for a term of five years from the date of completion of their contracts, which sum shall not in any case be less than 25 per cent of the estimated cost of such work or material.

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I will state just what this bill proposes. Under the present law in the District of Columbia a contractor is required to put up a bond for the full amount of his contract, and in cases of street improvements the bond runs for five years. The contractors go to the guaranty companies and pay for this five-year bond, and then add the amount of it to their bid for the work. The Commissioners recommend that the bond in such cases may be reduced to 25 per cent of the gross amount of the contract, which will amply secure the District and save a good deal of money. That is all that the measure does.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JURISDICTION OF RESERVATION NO. 32.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8688) to transfer jurisdiction of reservation No. 32 in the city of Washington, D. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the jurisdiction and control of public reservation No. 32, bounded by Pennsylvania avenue, Fourteenth street, E street, and Thirteen-and-a-half street NW., in the city of Washington, D. C., is hereby transferred from the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in order to provide a suitable approach to the new District building to be located fronting said reservation.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this bill refers to the little flat-iron piece or block of ground immediately in front of the site for the new municipal building on Pennsylvania avenue. The bill gives the Commissioners, instead of the War Department, control of that block—transfers the jurisdiction to the Commissioners of the District.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF SNOW AND ICE FROM SIDEWALKS.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10421) to provide for the removal of snow and ice from the sidewalks of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of every tenant or occupant of any lot or lots of ground in the District of Columbia improved by a house or building adjacent to any improved sidewalk, within the first four hours of daylight after the ceasing of any fall of snow, to cause said snow to be removed from the paved sidewalk adjacent to such lot or lots to the extent in length to which said lot or lots abut thereon and to the extent in breadth of not less than six feet, and if such improved sidewalk be not of such width, then to the extent of the width thereof; and in the event any snow that may have fallen shall, before its removal, become so hardened by freezing or otherwise that it can not be removed without great difficulty, or if at any time ice shall have formed on any such improved sidewalk by the freezing of rain, hail, melted snow, or in any other manner, it shall be the duty of such tenant or occupant, within the first four hours of daylight thereafter, to sprinkle, or cause such snow or ice, to the extent aforesaid, to be sprinkled with sand, sawdust, or other such substance. And for any violation of the provisions of this section such tenant or occupant shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5 or by imprisonment in the workhouse of the District of Columbia not exceeding five days, and by an additional fine not exceeding $5 or by additional imprisonment in the workhouse of the District of Columbia not exceeding five days for each additional twenty-four hours after the expiration of the time hereinbefore provided that such tenant or occupant shall suffer or permit such snow or ice to remain without being sprinkled or removed as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as soon as practicable after the ceasing of any fall of snow or after the accumulation of ice on the paved sidewalks of the District of Columbia in front of and adjacent to public buildings, public squares, and public reservations in the said District owned or leased by said District, to cause such snow or ice to be removed, and also to cause the same to be removed from all cross walks of improved streets and places of intersection of alleys with improved sidewalks; but in the event of inability to remove such accumulation of snow or ice by reason of the hardening thereof, it shall be their duty, as soon as practicable, to cause such paved sidewalks, cross walks, and places of intersection of alleys with improved sidewalks to be sprinkled with sand, sawdust, or other such material.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the owner or owners of every vacant or unimproved lot in the District of Columbia fronting or abutting upon a paved sidewalk, within the first four hours of daylight after the ceasing of any fall of snow, as set forth in section 1 hereof, to cause such snow to be removed from the paved sidewalk in front of such lot or lots in the same manner, and to the same extent, and subject to the same penalty as provided in said section; and in the event any snow that may have fallen shall, before its removal, become so hardened by freezing or otherwise that it can not be removed without great difficulty, or if at any time ice shall have formed on any such sidewalk by the freezing of rain, hail, melted snow, or in any other manner, it shall be the duty of such owner or owners, within the first four hours of daylight thereafter, to sprinkle, or cause such frozen snow or ice, to the extent aforesaid, to be sprinkled with sand or sawdust or other such substance; and for failure to do so such owner or owners shall be subject to the same penalty provided in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 4. That in the event of the failure of any such owner or owners of any vacant or unimproved lot to cause the removal of such snow or ice, or to sprinkle the same as hereinbefore provided, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as soon as practicable after the expiration of the time herein provided for the removal or sprinkling thereof, to cause the snow or ice in front of such lot to be removed or to cause the same to be sprinkled as hereinbefore directed to be done by such owner or owners; and upon each and every such removal or sprinkling by them they shall assess the sum of $1 against each such lot, and where any such lot has a frontage in excess of 25 feet an additional sum of $1 for each additional frontage of 25 feet or fractional part thereof, which said assessment shall be a lien on such lot when entered of record on the tax records of the District of Columbia, and to continue until paid, and shall be added to the general tax annually levied on such lot, and shall be collected in the same manner and as part of such general tax: Provided, however, That such removal or sprinkling by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and assessment therefor, shall not relieve the owner or occupant from the penalty hereinbefore provided for failure to remove or sprinkle such snow or ice.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of every owner of any unimproved or nontenanted improved lot or lots, and of the tenant or occupant of any improved lot or lots of ground in the District of Columbia, within three days after notice to do so by the Commissioners, to cause to be cleaned off and removed all dirt, sand, gravel, or other refuse matter that may fall, wash, or be placed upon any paved sidewalk adjacent to such lot or lots in the District of Columbia, subject to the same penalty provided in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 6. That in the event of failure on the part of any owner, tenant, or occupant of any improved or unimproved lot or lots of ground in the District of Columbia to comply with the provisions of the preceding section of this act within five days after notice hereinbefore provided, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District to cause the removal of such accumulation of dirt, sand, gravel, or other refuse matter; and upon any and every such removal by them they shall make an assessment on account thereof at the same rates and under the same provisions named in section 4 of this act.

SEC. 7. That, to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to comply with the provisions of sections 4 and 6 of this act, the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated, one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated: Provided, however, That all assessments collected under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the appropriation herein made, and shall form a continuous fund for the purpose of complying with the provisions of said sections 4 and 6.

SEC. 8. That all prosecutions under this act shall be in the police court of the District of Columbia, in the name of said District, and by its attorney or one of his assistants.

SEC. 9. That the act of Congress approved March 2, 1897, entitled "An act for the removal of snow and ice from the sidewalks, cross walks, and gutters in the District of Columbia," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia were read, as follows:

Page 2, strike out, in lines 9 and 10, the words "not more than" and insert after the word "dollars," in line 10, the words "and costs."

Page 2, line 12, strike out the words "not exceeding" and insert in lieu thereof the word "of," and insert after the word "dollars" in said line, the words "and costs."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask a vote on these amendments of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. I offer the amendments which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "ground," strike out the word "in," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "within the fire limits of."

Page 3, line 12, after the word "lot," strike out the word "in," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "within the fire limits of."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3479. An act making provision for conveying in fee certain public grounds in the city of St. Augustine, Fla., for school purposes; and

S. R. 34. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point Alfonso Zelaya, of Nicaragua.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 98. Joint resolution to provide for the removal of snow and ice from the streets, cross walks, and gutters of the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate concurrent resolution No. 20.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution No. 38.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be given to the people of Wisconsin for the statue of James Marquette, the renowned missionary and explorer.

Resolved, That the statue be accepted, to remain in the National Statuary Hall, in the Capitol of the nation, and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the presiding officers of the House of Representatives and Senate, be forwarded to his excellency the governor of the State of Wisconsin.

INSANE PERSONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8692) to authorize the apprehension and detention of insane persons in the District of Columbia and providing for their temporary commitment in the Government Hospital for the Insane, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia or any other officer in said District authorized to make arrests is hereby authorized and empowered to apprehend and detain, without warrant, any insane person or person of unsound mind found on any street, avenue, alley, or other public highway, or found in any public building or other public place within the District of Columbia; and it shall be the duty of the policeman or officer so apprehending or detaining any such person to immediately file his affidavit with the major and superintendent of said Metropolitan police that he believes said person to be insane or of unsound mind, incapable of taking care of himself or herself or his or her property, and if permitted to remain at large or to go unrestrained in the District of Columbia the rights of persons and of property will be jeopardized or the preservation of public peace imperiled and the commission of crime rendered probable: Provided, however, That it shall be the duty of the major and superintendent of the said Metropolitan police to forthwith notify the husband or wife or some near relative or friend of the person so apprehended and detained whose address may be known to the said major and superintendent or whose address can by reasonable inquiry be ascertained by him.

SEC. 2. That the major and superintendent of said Metropolitan police is hereby authorized to order the apprehension and detention, without warrant, of any indigent person alleged to be insane or of unsound mind or any alleged insane person of homicidal or otherwise dangerous tendencies found elsewhere in the District of Colombia than in the places mentioned in section 1 hereof whenever two or more responsible residents of the District of Columbia shall make and file affidavits with said major and superintendent of the Metropolitan police setting forth that they believe the person therein named to be insane or of unsound mind, the length of time they have known such person, that they believe such person to be incapable of managing his or her own affairs, and that such person is not fit to be at large or to go unrestrained, and if such person is permitted to remain at liberty in the District of Columbia the rights of persons and of property will be jeopardized or the preservation of public peace imperiled and the commission of crime rendered probable, and that such person is a fit subject for treatment on account of his or her mental condition: Provided, however, That before the major and superintendent of the said Metropolitan police shall order the apprehension and detention of any person upon the affidavits of the aforesaid residents, he shall, in addition thereto, require the certificate of at least two physicians who shall certify that they have examined the person alleged to be insane or of unsound mind, and that such person should not be allowed to remain at liberty and go unrestrained, and that such person is a fit subject for treatment on account of his or her mental condition.

SEC. 3. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to place in the Government Hospital for the Insane in said District, and the superintendent of said hospital is hereby authorized to receive, upon the written request of the said Commissioners, for a period of time not exceeding thirty days, indigent persons alleged to be insane or of unsound mind, residents of or found within the District of Columbia, and alleged insane persons of homicidal or otherwise dangerous tendencies residents of or found within the said District, so apprehended and detained as provided in sections 1 and 2 of this act, pending the formal commitment of such persons to said hospital as provided by law, or their transportation to their homes when their places of residence are ascertained by the proper officials charged by law with that duty.

SEC. 4. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may authorize the temporary commitment of any of the above-mentioned insane persons or persons of unsound mind so apprehended and detained as provided in sections 1 and 2 of this act (for a period of time not exceeding thirty days) in any other hospital in said District which, in the judgment of the health officer of said District, is properly constructed and equipped for the reception and care of such persons, and the official in charge of which, for the time being, is willing to receive such persons pending the temporary commitment or the formal commitment of such persons, as provided by law, to the Government Hospital for the Insane or to any other hospital or insane asylum; or any such alleged insane person or person of unsound mind apprehended under sections 1 and 2 of this act may be detained in any police station or house of detention in said District pending the completion of arrangements for his or her temporary detention in the Government Hospital for the Insane or any other hospital or insane asylum; and such persons may be detained in any police station or house of detention in said District until formally committed to the Government Hospital for the Insane or any other hospital or asylum, in the manner provided by law, in case he or she can not be provided for by the said Government Hospital for the Insane and no arrangement can be made for his or her temporary detention in any other hospital or asylum: Provided, however, That if, pending the formal commitment of such alleged insane person or person of unsound mind to the Government Hospital for the Insane or to any other hospital or asylum, the superintendent of said Government Hospital for the Insane, in the case of the commitment of a person to said hospital under the provisions of this act, or if two or more physicians in regular attendance at any other hospital or asylum where any person is committed under the provisions of this act, or if two or more surgeons of the police and fire departments, in the case of any person detained at any police station house or house of detention under the provisions of this act, shall certify in writing to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia that such person is not insane or that he or she has recovered his or her reason, the official in charge of the Government Hospital for the Insane or the hospital or asylum in which such person is confined, or the major and superintendent of said Metropolitan police, if such person be confined in a police station house or in a house of detention, shall discharge such alleged insane person or person of unsound mind forthwith and immediately report such action to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That for the purposes of this act no certificate as to the sanity or the insanity of any person shall be valid which has been issued (a) by a physician who has not been regularly licensed to practice medicine in the District of Columbia, unless he be a commissioned surgeon of the United States Army, Navy, or Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service; or (b) by a physician who is not a permanent resident of the District of Columbia; or (c) by a physician who has not been actively engaged in the practice of his profession for at least three years; or (d) by a physician who is related by blood or by marriage to the person whose mental condition is in question. Nor shall any certificate alleging the insanity of any person be valid which has been issued by a physician who is financially interested in the hospital or asylum in which the alleged insane person is to be confined, or who is professionally or officially connected therewith.

SEC. 6. That any person who makes an affidavit, as required by section 1 or 2 of this act, by which he or she secures or attempts to secure the apprehension, detention, or restraint of any other person in the District of Columbia without probable cause for believing such person to be insane or of unsound mind, or any physician who knowingly makes any false certificate as to the sanity or insanity of any other person shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.

SEC. 7. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia was read, as follows:

On page 3, line 12, insert, after the word "residents," the following: "or in case of arrest, as provided in section 1."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, I should like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK]. Is there any provision in this bill for submitting to a jury the question of sanity in these cases?

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH], the chairman of the judicial branch of our committee, that he may answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. PEARRE. I should like to know whether there is in this bill any provision for submitting the question of sanity in these cases to a jury for its determination?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. No, sir.

Mr. PEARRE. Does not the gentleman think that, following the practice of almost all the States, it would be wise to provide that, at least in the last resort, there should be a reference of the matter to the judgment of a jury?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. This is only a temporary matter.

Mr. PEARRE. Temporary? Does not the bill provide that upon the simple affidavit of two physicians a man may be confined in an insane asylum—for how long? Is there any limitation as to the time?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Not exceeding thirty days.

Mr. PEARRE. Then what is to be done with him?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Then he has a trial in the ordinary way.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say to the gentleman that the object of this bill is particularly to provide for indigent insane persons, and that class of insane people who are found on the streets——

Mr. PEARRE. What is to be done with them eventually, under this bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. I understand that the usual course of law is proceeded with. Ordinarily it will not require thirty days, but if they had a press of business and a great number of cases it might be that long before a case could be reached. In the end they are brought before the court in the usual way for examination. There is nothing in this bill that interferes at all with an examination by a court or a jury or anything of that kind. It provides for the temporary work of the officers, and the gentleman understands that there is now no provision in the District of Columbia which covers that at all.

Mr. PEARRE. There ought to be.

Mr. BABCOCK. There is no provision for temporarily detaining even a violently insane person.

Mr. PEARRE. Under the gentleman's assurance that this provides for only a temporary detention, and does not contemplate a permanent detention of anyone——

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. PEARRE. Under his assurance that it does not contemplate the permanent detention of the party charged with insanity, without examination by a jury, I will, of course, withdraw any objection. But it would be a very dangerous principle to permit a man alleged to be insane to be apprehended and permanently detained upon a mere affidavit.

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, certainly.

Mr. PEARRE. Or upon the ex parte statement of a physician.

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, certainly; the gentleman is entirely right.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, there is one provision in this bill that struck me as conferring quite extraordinary powers upon policemen. It is contained in the first section. As I understood it from the reading, it provides that a policeman may arrest and take into custody without warrant any person who is insane or of unsound mind, without regard to the question whether he is dangerous or violently insane. Does it not so provide?

Mr. BABCOCK. Under the police powers of the District a policeman has the right to arrest a drunken man without a warrant if the man is disorderly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. BABCOCK. If it is patent and clear that a man is insane, he may be dangerously insane, and the lives of other people may be endangered, and it becomes the duty of a policeman to take him in charge.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is true; but the criticism I make of your bill is that it does not limit the subjects of arrest to violent or dangerously insane persons. A man may be a harmless lunatic. He may be of unsound mind according to the standard fixed by the courts, but may be perfectly harmless; and yet a policeman is given the power to take him into custody and to set in motion proceedings to take from him his liberty. I think——

Mr. BABCOCK. I call the gentleman's attention to this:

Provided he is incapable of taking care of himself.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Where is that provision?

Mr. BABCOCK. In line 3 of page 2, section 1.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I did not hear the provision as it was being read on account of the confusion, but what I heard impressed me that it was an exceedingly dangerous and a most extraordinary power to confer upon a policeman, to arrest a harmless insane person without warrant or authority of law.

Mr. BABCOCK. Another thing I want to call the gentleman's attention to is that the policeman making the arrest must immediately and forthwith report to the chief of police.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But suppose the man be a resident of the city, a harmless lunatic, and we know almost every city has them. It is not the policy of the law and perhaps no public purpose is subserved by setting in motion machinery to detain such persons. Confinement is not necessary for the public safety, where a lunatic is harmless.

Mr. COWHERD. May I call the gentleman's attention to the limitation of that power?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I wish you would. I may have obtained a wrong impression from the reading.

Mr. COWHERD. This affidavit must also provide that—

If permitted to remain at large or to go unrestrained in the District of Columbia the rights of persons and of property will be jeopardized or the preservation of public peace imperiled and the commission of crime rendered probable.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. How soon after the arrest is that affidavit required?

Mr. COWHERD. That must be made immediately, and there must be the certificate of two physicians.

Mr. PEARRE. I call the gentleman's attention, also, to the fact that the relatives of the alleged lunatic must be immediately notified.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. These safeguards may be sufficient: I do not know. I am willing to submit that question to the judgment of the committee.

Mr. COWHERD. There must be a certificate of two physicians, and there must be the affidavits of two responsible residents of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My first impression was that it conferred upon policemen, without warrant of law, the authority to take up anybody the policeman might deem to be of unsound mind, without regard to the question of danger or violence; but if in the judgment of the committee the personal rights of the alleged lunatic are sufficiently safeguarded, I have no objection to it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to say, further, to the gentleman from Indiana that this bill has been as carefully provided with safeguards as the Commissioners, the medical societies, the superintendents of the different asylums, and the committee could possibly provide.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, this bill provides for the custody of the insane. Does it undertake to provide for guardianship?

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Or control of the property?

Mr. BABCOCK. The very object of the bill is to provide for the indigent insane. That is the prime object of the bill. For instance, a man has gone crazy round here without friends or without relatives.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. To provide for their restraint and treatment?

Mr. BABCOCK. It provides for examination.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. BABCOCK. Within thirty days.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The purpose is to protect the public against the violently insane?

Mr. BABCOCK. That is it exactly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And does not undertake to take further action as to the property?

Mr. BABCOCK. Not at all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And it is merely temporary?

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to say to the gentleman that at the present time to effect the arrest of an insane person it has to be accomplished on the charge of some crime, as that he has committed a theft, or something of that description. As the law is at present, the police department is incapable of arresting a person whether he is evidently insane or not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is there no authority now for the police to arrest a dangerously insane person?

Mr. BABCOCK. Except on a charge of being disorderly.

Mr. MORRELL. Except on a charge of being disorderly or some other infraction of police regulations.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MUTUAL INVESTMENT FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2781.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2871) to incorporate the Mutual Investment Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That Richard J. Beall, Andrew O. Nash, William O. Denison, R. O'Neill, Bernard Leonard, Howard Beall, and John R. Wright, all of the District of Columbia, with their associates and successors, are hereby created a body politic and corporate by the name and style of the "Mutual Investment Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia," and by that name shall have perpetual succession, with power to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in courts of law and equity; to adopt a common seal, and the same to break, alter, and renew at pleasure; to ordain and establish by-laws and regulations; and generally to do such acts and things as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this charter and promote the purposes and designs of said company.

SEC. 2. That the purposes and designs of said company shall be to insure, against lost or damage by fire, the respective dwelling houses and other buildings, and the furniture and every description of property belonging to its members.

SEC. 3. That the capital stock of said company shall consist of the premium notes given by the insured, the cash paid as interest thereon, and all property and profit derived from the investment or use of its income or assets, but the reserve fund of said company shall not, at any one time, exceed $200,000, exclusive of the real estate it may hold as hereinafter authorized.

SEC. 4. That the said premium notes shall be payable on demand, and shall each constitute and be a lien to the amount thereof respectively upon the interest and estate, legal and equitable, of the insured in the said buildings at risk in said company, and upon the land, premises, and appurtenances thereto belonging: Provided, That the lien upon personal property shall continue only while the same remains in the ownership of the person insured: And provided also, That said company shall file with the recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia a memorandum of the name of the person insured, a description of the property, and the amount of the premium note unpaid, and said lien shall commence from the time of filing said memorandum. Judgment upon said note may be entered upon confession by virtue of a warrant of attorney, and execution may at any time be had thereon; but the privileges, immunities, and franchises granted by this charter shall be confined to the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That all persons who shall hereafter insure with said company, and their executors, administrators, and assigns continuing to be so insured, shall thereby become members thereof during the period they shall be and remain so insured, and no longer, and the word "person" as used in this charter shall be held to include corporations also.

SEC. 6. That each and every member of said company shall have full power to withdraw therefrom, in whole or in part, at any time, upon application in writing to the proper officer thereof, and payment of all arrearages of assessments and interest that may then be due and owing to said company from said member. Upon such application, the said officer shall cancel the insurance or insurances designated in said application, together with the premium note or notes held by said company on account of said canceled insurance. Said officer shall also return any amount of money which may be due said member on the books of said company on account of said canceled insurance, and thereafter said member shall be debarred from all claim on said company on account of such canceled insurance accruing subsequent to such withdrawal and cancellation. But no premium note or notes shall be canceled or in any manner discharged or given up until all assessments thereon on account of liabilities incurred before or at the time of such withdrawal shall be fully ascertained and paid.

SEC. 7. That the affairs of said company shall be conducted by a board of seven trustees, who shall be elected at the annual meeting of the members, and shall continue in office until their successors are elected and qualified. Not less than a majority of said board shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a less number may adjourn from time to time. Vacancies happening in said board, otherwise than by removal, as hereinafter provided, may be filled by the remaining trustees for the residue of the term for which they were elected. Said board shall choose one of their number as president and one as vice-president; and they shall also appoint such other officers as may be necessary for conducting the affairs of said company.

SEC. 8. That the seven persons first named in this charter shall be the board of trustees of said company until the first annual meeting, and until their successors are chosen and qualified. Such of them as may be present at their first meeting may proceed to organize by electing a president, vice-president, and other officers; and as soon thereafter as practicable said board shall adopt by-laws, provide the necessary books, and otherwise prepare the company for the transaction of business, and thereafter said board shall exercise a general superintendence of the affairs of the company: Provided, That the said by-laws shall only be adopted by the concurrent vote of at least two-thirds of the whole board of trustees, and when once adopted any alteration or amendment shall only be made at an annual meeting of the company, notice of such proposed alteration or amendment having been filed in the office of the company at least thirty days before the day fixed for said annual meeting. A majority of two-thirds of the votes cast shall be necessary to the adoption of any such alteration or amendment, but when thus adopted the same shall be binding on all the members of the company.

SEC. 9. That the board of trustees shall, by general rules, determine the rates of insurance, the sum to be insured, and the rate of interest to be paid upon the premium notes, which latter, however, shall not exceed 3 per cent per annum. No more than $5,000 shall be insured on any one risk, unless the premium notes shall amount to over $100,000; and in that case no one risk shall exceed 5 per cent on the whole amount of premium notes.

SEC. 10. That every person who shall become a member of said company by effecting insurance therein shall deposit his promissory note, payable on demand, for such sum, and upon such interest, not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, as may be required under the general rules prescribed by the board of trustees; and said notes shall be liable to assessment pro rata at any time when the trustees shall deem the same requisite for the payment of losses or the current expenses of the company; and no policy shall bind the company until such note has been given.

SEC. 11. That whenever the board of trustees, for the purposes of paying the losses or current expenses, shall deem it necessary to call for the payment of any portion of the principal of the premium notes, they shall settle and determine the sum to be paid by the several members (but always in proportion to the original amount of the respective premium notes). Notices of such call shall be given to the members in such manner as the by-laws shall prescribe; and if any member shall neglect or refuse to pay the sum assessed upon said member for the space of thirty days after receiving such notice, the company may proceed to collect the whole amount of such premium note, together with costs; and the amount of the note, less the expense of collecting the same, shall be placed in the treasury of the company subject to the same liabilities as said note would have been subject to. But nothing in this charter contained shall be construed as requiring losses and expenses to be paid exclusively from assessments on premium notes, but they may be paid out of such assets as the board of trustees shall, by general rules, prescribe.

SEC. 12. That all just and lawful claims of members for loss or damage sustained by fire shall be certified in accordance with the terms of the policy within sixty days after due notice of the loss has been filed with the company. No suit shall be brought upon any such claim for damages until after the expiration of said sixty days, and no member of the company shall be incompetent as a witness in such suit on account of his said membership.

SEC. 13. That a general meeting of said company shall be held annually at such time and place as shall be designated in the by-laws. The president may, at any time, call a special meeting of the company, and shall do so at the request in writing of fifty members. The election of trustees shall be held at the annual meeting, and shall be by ballot, and each member shall have one vote on each risk, which must be deposited by the policy holder. At least two weeks' previous notice of each annual or special meeting shall be given by publication in two newspapers of general circulation in the city of Washington: Provided, That at any called meeting of the company the trustees, or any of them, may be removed by a vote of three-fourths of the members present and voting, and the vacancies thus created may be filled at such meeting for the unexpired term; but notice of such proposed action shall be given in the call for the meeting.

SEC. 14. That the board of trustees of said company shall cause to be published annually, in some newspaper of general circulation in the city of Washington, and at least two weeks prior to the annual meeting of the members, a statement of its financial condition, in which shall be shown the amount of premium notes and cash on hand, the amount of securities held by the company, the amount of losses, if any, during the previous year, and such other items relating to the business of the company as said board may think proper.

SEC. 15. That nothing in this charter shall be construed to grant banking privileges or the right to issue any note to circulate as currency or money. It shall, however, be lawful for said company to employ and improve all moneys received by it and the profits thereon in such manner as the trustees may deem best for the interest of the company; but the said company shall not purchase and hold real estate, at any one time, in excess of a cash value of $50,000: Provided, that this shall not include any purchase to protect the interests of the company at sales under trusts, mortgages, judgments, or decrees.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Page 2, line 5, strike out the words "capital stock" and insert in lieu thereof the word "assets."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill to explain the language of section 15, beginning with the word "it," in line 14.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS], who made the report on the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN (reading):

It shall, however, be lawful for said company to employ and improve all moneys received by it and the profits thereon in such manner as the trustees may deem best for the interest of the company; but the said company shall not purchase and hold real estate, at any one time, in excess of the cash value of $50,000.

Now, there is also a limitation in this bill that they shall not issue bank notes to circulate as money; but aside from these two limitations it appears to give to this corporation authority to transact any business which they see fit to, and to employ their money in any way, any kind of business, that they may see fit to do.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Well, I think, Mr. Chairman, that is a rather broad construction of the bill. Let me say, in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, that this bill as drawn is almost an exact copy of the bill which Congress passed in 1876, to incorporate the Provident Mutual Fire Insurance Company. Perhaps I may say just here, in explanation of the bill at this time, that in 1855 Congress granted the first charter to a company for mutual fire insurance in the District of Columbia, and in 1876 it passed another charter of the same kind. These incorporators assumed that they had the right under the general insurance laws of the District to incorporate, and they did go through the form of incorporation; they did business for some six years, and at the end of that time, last summer, they had 311 members in their association and property in the form of premium notes amounting to $85,000, when notice was served on them that they did not have the right to do business, because they were a mutual company and not a stock company. Then they framed and presented this bill, which is a copy, or substantially a copy, of the charter that was granted to the Provident Company in 1876. In the meantime, for the past six months, their business has been suspended.

Now, with reference to the clause which has been referred to by the gentleman from Iowa, I will say that my understanding of that limitation is this: They have money in the treasury, and in order that they may improve that money or invest it, they are limited to any improvement or investment of that money outside of any investment in real estate.

Now, I do not assume that there is any likelihood that they will build a railroad, nor is there any likelihood that they will go into any such venture, for the very reason that the company can never have property over $200,000. As I said, the bill follows the other two acts passed by Congress, and those were carefully examined by the committee, and the bill is also recommended by the Commissioners, so I assume that the character and standing of the associates or incorporators have already been approved by the Commissioners of the District.

Mr. SULZER. If the gentleman will give way for a moment, as I understand this bill relates entirely to fire insurance.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. To fire insurance on the mutual plan.

Mr. SULZER. And it does not relate to life insurance?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. No, it does not relate to life insurance.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the proviso in line 21, page 7:

That at any called meeting of the company the trustees, or any of them, may be removed by a vote of three-fourths of the members present and voting.

Not a quorum, but of those who happen to be present. Is that as the gentleman wants it?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Well, the fair presumption is that every member has been notified to be present and that three-fourths of those present and voting is satisfactory. You understand that the public are not interested in this charter beyond the framing of a proper law for the government of a mutual association, and this is a mutual association at the present time, with a trifle over 300 members. I see no objection to that proviso that if three-fourths of the members present and voting at a regular meeting choose to remove a trustee and the members of the association are satisfied with that form of the bill—I see no objection why they should not have that proviso.

Mr. HEPBURN. This may be a special meeting.

Mr. SULZER. I desire to ask in that connection what constitutes a quorum?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I am not sure what the provision is in reference to a quorum of the members.

Mr. SULZER. Why should not this provision read three-fourths of a quorum?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I assume that the by-laws they adopt will determine what a quorum shall be. I think we may fairly assume they will insist that a quorum shall be a majority of the members of the association. That is left entirely to the by-laws to be adopted hereafter by the incorporation.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

EXTENDING DUTIES OF HARBOR MASTER.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 8686.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8686) to amend section 895 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 895 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia is hereby amended by adding the following to the first paragraph thereof:

"SEC. 895. Every vessel coming to anchor in any other portion of the navigable waters in the District of Columbia shall also be so moored under the direction of the harbor master, or the pilot of the police boat acting in the harbor master's absence, as not to obstruct the channel, and be secured with an anchor at bow and stern as to keep the long axis of the vessel parallel with that of the channel and prevent it from swinging so as to obstruct the free passage of the channel by other vessels."

SEC. 2. That the provision in the third paragraph of said section requiring "any captain or owner of or anyone in charge of any barge, sand scow, or any vessel that may sink in said canals, shall raise and remove the same in five days," is hereby made applicable to the captain or owner of any sunken vessel or other structure in any dock or at the end of any wharf in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I would say that this bill simply extends the duties of the harbor master. Under the provisions of the present law if a boat or scow sinks at the dock the owners must raise and clear the river within five days. This extends the law to Georgetown and to the Eastern Branch.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 7024 may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

NAMING STREETS, ETC., OUTSIDE THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7024) to name streets, avenues, alleys, highways, and reservations in that part of the District of Columbia outside of the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of this bill and that the same may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7024) to name streets, avenues, alleys, highways, and reservations in that part of the District of Columbia outside of the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to name or rename streets, avenues, alleys, highways, and reservations in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of the city of Washington, under such system of naming as they shall see fit to adopt, and such names when recorded in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia shall thereafter be the official names of such streets, avenues, alleys, highways, and reservations.

SEC. 2. That upon the abandonment of any street, avenue, road, or highway, or part thereof, under the provisions of "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," approved March 2, 1893, and the amendment thereto, approved June 28, 1898, the title to the land contained in such abandoned portion shall revert to the owners of the land abutting thereon.

SEC. 3. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives, by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bill of the following title:

On January 30, 1904:

H. R. 6804. An act providing for the appointment of a customs appraiser at Pittsburg, Pa.

VINCENZO GERARDI.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union may be discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4344) for the relief of Vincenzo Gerardi, of Washington, D. C., and that the same may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4344) for the relief of Vincenzo Gerardi, of Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of this bill and that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the petitioner is about 60 years of age; he purchased property in the city of Washington, D. C., before he was a naturalized citizen; he has been a resident of the United States for the past thirty-one years, and is now a naturalized and reputable citizen of the District of Columbia, and prays for Congressional relief: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That all real estate lying in the District of Columbia heretofore purchased and conveyed to Vincenzo Gerardi, of said District, prior to the passage of this act, be relieved and exempted from the operation of an act entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens," approved March 3, 1887, and all forfeitures incurred by force of said act are in respect of such real estate hereby remitted.

The following amendment was recommended by the committee:

Strike out the preamble.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask for an explanation of this bill. I remember a few years ago that there were a number of gentlemen at that time Members of this House labeled "Populists," who were very insistent on the passage of the bill that is referred to in this one—namely, to prevent foreigners from owning real estate within the limits of the United States. A good many of our Democratic brethren were very insistent that that law should pass. It was almost a party question with them. I want to know from some of these gentlemen who were so exercised at that time over this matter. I see before me my genial friend from Georgia, who, I think, took quite an interest in the legislation, and I want to know why he is willing to allow this foreigner to have an interest in real estate in the United States?

Mr. GRIGGS. Which gentleman from Georgia does the gentleman refer to? There are two of them before the gentleman.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think I may take either one, but I will take the one who represents his party as chairman of the Congressional committee.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I would like for the gentleman to yield to me long enough to say that if I ever took such a position I do not remember it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, speaking for myself, I have not been as long in Congress as the gentleman from Iowa, but I have no recollection of taking any such position as he intimates. I will state that it has been a law on the statute books of Georgia since long before I was born, and I expect before the gentleman from Iowa, young as he is, was born, providing that corporations and foreigners shall not own over 5,000 acres of land in Georgia. I have no recollection of taking any position on this question in Congress, and I am free to confess that I do not know exactly what this bill is.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I dissent somewhat from the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa that this is a Populistic question, as he well understands this alien land law formerly applied to all the Territories and as to them has been repealed, so that a foreigner may own land in the Territories. I want to say that if this was a proposition to allow foreigners to acquire land in the District of Columbia without limit I should oppose it, for I do not believe it would be proper legislation or tend toward making this capital city the truly American city intended by its founders. For one I should seriously object to foreigners, owing no duty to our Government, intruding themselves into our national life in this way.

Mr. SULZER. So would I, Mr. Speaker. I agree with the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word myself, and then I will yield to the gentleman from New York. I am not expressing or desirous of expressing any views as to the wisdom or unwisdom of this particular legislation. I want to know why it is that these gentlemen and my friend from New York, since he has jumped in, why it is you have changed front so upon this question?

Mr. SULZER. I have not changed front. I am now, always have been, and always expect to be opposed to aliens and alien corporations buying up and owning large tracts of land in this country to the exclusion of our own bona fide settlers and citizens. This bill is quite a different proposition. This man is now a naturalized citizen. This bill simply gives him a good title to his own property. It is all right in my opinion.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to call attention to the fact that this is not the first bill of this kind. There have been a dozen or more since the legislation that is referred to in this bill was enacted of this same character; they make an exception in favor of every foreigner that wants it made in his behalf. They want the general legislation, but they do not want to enforce it. Why is that? Will you pass this legislation now? Is it wise or isn't it? Here is a question whether this foreigner shall be permitted to have land in the District of Columbia, this sacred soil; and I submit to the gentleman from Michigan that now is an opportunity for him to be heard. Will the gentleman from New York vote to pass this legislation?

Mr. SULZER. Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa that he is entirely mistaken regarding this matter. This man is a citizen, and this bill only gives him a title to his own property without a cloud, so that he can convey a good title if he wants to sell it or will it away. The man is not a foreigner now. That is all there is to this matter.

Mr. HEPBURN. He claims he is a citizen now, but he was not when the title was acquired.

Mr. SULZER. That is so; and this bill simply corrects his title.

Mr. HEPBURN. And I want these gentlemen now to fish or cut bait. [Laughter.] I want them to acknowledge that they were simply playing——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Horse. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. No, spectacular politics, when they offered this legislation a little while ago, that there was not anything in it and that there is not anything in it now, and they know there is not, because they make exceptions under some pretext or other whenever there is a possibility of enforcing the law which they insisted a little while ago was so important.

Mr. SULZER. The trouble is that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has not read the report. This man is now a naturalized citizen.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And that to ask if it is not a fact that in every city under national jurisdiction now foreigners may purchase and hold real estate, and that Washington is the only exception to the rule; and in addition to that, in his invitation for opposition to that law, to explain why they should not have the same right in the District of Columbia as in all other cities under national jurisdiction.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not explaining. I did not vote for the legislation. I knew it was humbug and bug dust, when the gentlemen were insisting upon it, and I knew that they did not mean anything, and now I want to know why it is they are changing front.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the gentleman does not explain why we should not have the same rule here as obtains in other cities under national jurisdiction.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is not my place to explain. The gentleman is voting for all the possible exceptions to it, and is trying to do away with the effect of the law in each particular case when anybody asks it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; but we have not done that.

Mr. HEPBURN. But you have done it right along.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. We are only asking for the District of Columbia the same rights that they have in other cities.

Mr. HEPBURN. This committee has been compelled to bring in this kind of a bill to secure a special privilege for some one or other over and over again.

Mr. POU. I will explain, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. HEPBURN. But I do not want any explanation, unless the gentleman is going to tell us why he has changed front. [Laughter.]

Mr. POU. The reason is this: The simple fact is that at the time to which the gentleman refers a large number of Populists were sent here by Republican votes to this body from my own State.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, no. "Thou canst not say I did it; never shake thy gory locks at me." [Laughter.]

Mr. POU. But your party did it from the South, and they were the gentlemen to whom the gentleman refers.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, no; it was the Kansas variety of Populists, the Nebraska variety, the W. J. Bryan tribe of Populists that did this.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield for a question.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman proceeds I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa how much time he has left? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, my hour is not expired. I will yield to my friend from Wisconsin in a moment. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman charges this original law up to the Bryan Democracy. I want to say to the gentleman that the act which stands in the way of naturalized citizens owning real estate was approved March 3, 1887, and I want to ask the gentleman if we did not have the Cleveland brand of Democracy at that time and not the Bryan brand?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think you may have had that. It is a pretty good brand, the best you have ever had, and the only brand that has ever been approved by the American people in forty years. [Laughter.] You had better go back to it if you want another indorsement. [Laughter.] Now I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, before that is done, I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr ROBINSON of Indiana. At the last session of Congress a bill was introduced giving the right generally to foreigners to hold real estate in the District of Columbia, as the right is generally enjoyed throughout the other Territories, subject to national jurisdiction. That bill, I believe, is pending before the gentleman's committee at this session, and I want to ask how it is getting along?

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say that the bill has not been considered at this session of Congress. I believe the committee is in favor of the bill and will report it to the House before the close of the session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Can the gentleman give us any reason why Washington or the District of Columbia was excluded from the general law enabling foreigners in cities to hold title to real estate under national jurisdiction?

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not know that I can answer that question. This law as originally passed included the Territories. The principal object at that time was to prevent the getting together of large ranches in the Territories into a few hands. The Committee on the Territories or some other committee reported a bill which was enacted into law, relieving the Territories from this restriction, so that the District of Columbia is now the only part of the national territory where the law applies.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman knows of no reason why the District of Columbia should not be governed by the same law as those Territories?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment striking out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then passed.

CONDEMNATION OF INSANITARY BUILDINGS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 9293, and that the same be considered at this time in the House.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9293) to create a board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of this bill and that it be considered now in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is it proposed to consider this bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, so it may be open to amendment?

Mr. BABCOCK. It will be subject to amendment, of course.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and is hereby, created in and for the District of Columbia a board to be known as the board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, to consist of the assistant to the Engineer Commissioner in charge of buildings, the health officer, and the inspector of buildings of said District; and to have jurisdiction and authority to examine into the sanitary condition of all buildings in said District, to condemn those buildings which are in such insanitary condition as to endanger the health or lives of the occupants thereof or of persons living in the vicinity, and to cause all buildings to be put into sanitary condition or to be vacated, demolished, and removed, as may be required by the provisions of this act. Said board may authorize and direct the performance of any of the ministerial duties of said board by officers, agents, employees, contractors, and employees of contractors duly detailed or employed by the Commissioners of said District for that purpose. Said board, the members thereof, and all persons acting under its authority and by its direction, may, between the hours of 8 o'clock a. m. and 5 o'clock p. m., enter into and upon any and all lands and buildings in said District for the purpose of inspecting the same, and for the purpose of causing any such buildings to be vacated, demolished, and removed, as may be required by the provisions of this act. Said board shall report its operations to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia from time to time as said Commissioners direct. Said Commissioners shall furnish said board such assistance as may be required for the proper conduct of its work, by details from various departments and offices of the government of said District.

SEC. 2. That a majority of the board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings shall constitute a quorum, and a majority vote of the members present shall be necessary to condemn any building under this act. Whenever for any reason the health officer is unable to act as a member of said board the deputy health officer shall act as a member thereof in place of said health officer, and whenever for any reason the inspector of buildings is unable to act as a member of said board the principal assistant inspector of buildings shall act as a member thereof in place of said inspector of buildings; but no person shall act as a member of said board who has any property interests, direct or indirect, in his own right or through relatives or kin, in the building the sanitary condition of which is under consideration. The deputy health officer and the principal assistant inspector of buildings, when acting as members of the board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, shall have all authority and duties which are vested by this act in the health officer and the inspector of buildings, respectively, when acting in the same manner.

SEC. 3. That said board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings be, and is hereby, authorized to investigate, through personal inquiry and inspection by the members thereof, and through inquiry and inspection by officers, agents, and employees appointed or detailed for that purpose, into the sanitary condition of any building or part of a building in said District, except such as are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. If any building or part of a building be found, as the result of such investigation, to be in such insanitary condition as to endanger the health or the lives of the occupants thereof or of persons living in the vicinity, said board shall cause a notice to be served on each owner and part owner of such building requiring him to show cause within not less than twenty days, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, from the date of the service of said notice why such building or part of building should not be condemned. And if within the time specified in said notice no cause be shown sufficient in the opinion of a majority of said board to prevent the condemnation of such building or part of building said board shall issue an order condemning such building or part of building, and shall cause a copy of such order to be served on each owner or part owner thereof, and a copy or copies to be affixed to the building or part of building condemned.

SEC. 4. That from and after thirty days, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, after a copy or copies of any order of condemnation has been affixed to any condemned building or part of building no person shall occupy such building or part of building.

SEC. 5. That no person having authority to prevent shall permit any building or part of building condemned to be occupied except as specially authorized by the board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, under authority of section 6 of this act, after thirty days, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, from and after the date of the service of a copy of the order of condemnation on the owner of such building; or, if there be several part owners of such building, from the latest date of service on any part owner; or, if a copy or copies of such order of condemnation has been affixed to the condemned building or part of building at a date subsequent to the date of service of the notice on any owner or the latest date of service on any part owner, after thirty days from the date on which said copy or copies of such order of condemnation was so affixed.

SEC. 6. That if the owner or owners of any building or part of building condemned under the provisions of this act shall make such changes or repairs as will remedy in a manner satisfactory to said board the conditions which led to the condemnation of such building or part of building, said board shall cancel its order of condemnation and the building may be again occupied; and if such owner or owners can not make such changes or repairs within the period within which they may lawfully permit such building or part of building to be occupied under section 5 of this act, but proceed with such changes or repairs with reasonable diligence during that period, said board may, by special order, extend from time to time the period within which the occupants of said building or part of building may remain therein and within which the owner or owners thereof may permit them so to do.

SEC. 7. That the owner or owners of any building or buildings condemned under the provisions of this act, which can not be so changed or repaired as to remedy the condition which led to the condemnation thereof, shall demolish and remove such building or part of building within a time to be specified by said board in the order of condemnation. And if any owner or part owner shall fail or refuse to demolish and remove said building or part of building within the time so specified he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to the penalties provided by section 13 of this act, and such building or part of building shall be demolished and removed under the direction of the board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, and the cost of such demolition and removal, less the amount, if any, received from the sale of the old material, but including the cost of making good such damage to adjoining premises as may have resulted from such demolition and the cost of publication, if any, herein provided for, shall be assessed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia as a tax against the premises on which such building or part of building was situated, such tax to be collected in the same manner as general taxes are collected, and when collected shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the United States and the District of Columbia in equal parts.

SEC. 8. That whenever the title to any building or part of a building the condemnation of which is contemplated is in litigation, said board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings shall notify all parties to the suit and shall report the circumstances to the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, who shall bring such circumstances to the attention of the court in which such litigation is pending for the purpose of securing such order or decree as will enable said board to continue such proceedings looking toward condemnation, and such court is hereby authorized to make such decrees and orders in such pending suit as may be necessary for that purpose.

SEC. 9. That whenever the title to any building or part of building is vested in a person non compos mentis, or a minor child or minor children without legal guardian, said board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings shall report that fact to the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, who shall take due legal steps to secure the appointment of a guardian or guardians for such person non compos mentis, or minor child or children aforesaid, for the purpose of the condemnation proceedings authorized by this act. And any justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding the equity court is hereby authorized to appoint a guardian or guardians for that purpose.

SEC. 10. That any notice required by this act to be served shall be deemed to have been served if delivered to the person to be notified, or if left at the usual residence or place of business of the person to be notified, with a person of suitable age and discretion then resident therein; or if no such residence or place of business can be found in the District of Columbia by reasonable search if left with any person of suitable age and discretion employed therein at the office of any agent of the person to be notified, which agent has any authority or duty with reference to the land or tenement to which said notice relates; or if no such office can be found in said District by reasonable search if forwarded by registered mail to the last known address of the person to be notified and not returned by the post-office authorities; or if no address be known or can by reasonable diligence be ascertained, or if any notice forwarded as authorized by the preceding clause of this section be returned by the post-office authorities, if published on three consecutive days in a daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia; or if by reason of an outstanding unrecorded transfer of title the name of the owner in fact can not be ascertained beyond a reasonable doubt if served on the owner of record in the manner hereinbefore in this section provided. Any notice to a corporation shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to have been served on such corporation if served on the president, secretary, treasurer, general manager, or any principal officer of such corporation in the manner hereinbefore provided for the service of notices on natural persons holding property in their own right; and notice to a foreign corporation shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to have been served if served on any agent of such corporation personally, or if left with any person of suitable age and discretion residing at the usual residence or employed at the usual place of business of such agent in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 11. That no person shall interfere with any member of the board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings or with any person acting under authority and by direction of said board in the discharge of his lawful duties, nor hinder, prevent, or refuse to permit any lawful inspection or the performance of any work authorized by this act to be done by or by authority and direction of said board.

SEC. 12. That no person shall, without the consent of said board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings, deface, obliterate, remove, or conceal any copy of any order of condemnation which has been affixed to any building or part of building by order of said board; and the owner and the person having custody of any building or part of building to which a copy or copies of any such order has been affixed shall, if said copy of said order has been to his knowledge defaced, obliterated, or removed, forthwith report that fact in writing to said board, unless he has good reason to believe that such copy of such an order has been removed by authority of said board, and if such copy of such order has been concealed shall forthwith expose the same to view.

SEC. 13. That any person violating or aiding or abetting in violating any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof in the police court of the District of Columbia, upon information filed in the name of said District, be punished by a fine of not more than $100 or by imprisonment for not more than ninety days; and each day on which such unlawful act is done or during which such unlawful negligence continues shall constitute a separate and distinct offense.

SEC. 14. That the owner or owners of any building or part of building condemned under the provisions of this act may, within the time specified in the order of condemnation, institute proceedings in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting as a district court, for the modification or vacation of the order of condemnation aforesaid, and the court shall give precedence to any such case and shall hear the testimony adduced therein; and unless the court shall find that there is sufficient proof made of the necessity of the destruction of such building or part of building, the order of the board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings shall be modified or set aside, as said court shall direct; otherwise the court shall issue such orders and decrees as may be necessary to carry the order of said board, as made by the board or as modified by the court, into effect; and the court may appoint a committee of award, consisting of three persons, each of whom shall have the qualifications of jurors in the District of Columbia, who, after taking the oath required of jurors in the trial of civil causes, shall proceed to hear and receive evidence respecting the amount of damages to be awarded to the owner or owners of such condemned building or part of building aforesaid, and said committee may issue subpœnas requiring the attendance of witnesses before them and may administer oaths to such witnesses.

Witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify before said committee in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify in the supreme court of the District of Columbia; and, if need be, said committee shall be entitled, upon application, to the aid of said court to compel such attendance and giving of testimony. Unless the court shall order otherwise, the hearing of evidence before said committee need not be in the presence of the court, but they may meet in any room assigned to them by the United States marshal for the District of Columbia, who shall, in person or by deputy, attend such hearings. In such proceedings evidence shall be received by the committee of award appointed as aforesaid, to prove—

First. That the rental of the building was enhanced by reason of the same being used for illegal purposes, or being so overcrowded as to be dangerous or injurious to the health of the inmates; or

Second. That the building is in a state of defective sanitation, or is not in reasonably good repair; or

Third. That the building is unfit and not reasonably capable of being made fit for human habitation; and if the committee, or a majority of the members thereof, is satisfied by such evidence that compensation should be awarded, then the compensation—

(a) Shall in the first case, so far as it is based on rental, be on the rental of the building (as distinct from the ground rent), which would have been obtainable if the building was occupied for legal purposes, and only by the number of persons whom the building was, under all the circumstances of the case, fitted to accommodate without such overcrowding as is dangerous or injurious to the health of the inmates; and

(b) Shall in the second case be the amount estimated as the value of the building if it had been put into a sanitary condition, or into reasonably good repair, after deducting the estimated expense of putting it into such condition or repair; and

(c) Shall in the third case be the value of the materials of the building.

That after hearing and considering the testimony offered by the owner and offered on behalf of the District of Columbia, the said committee of award shall report to the court in writing the compensation allowed by them to the owner according to the provisions of this section. Unless cause be shown to the court within ten days from the filing of said report why the same should not be confirmed, the court shall confirm the same and judgment be entered thereon accordingly; but from the damages awarded in any case the cost of removing the building, including the cost of making good such damage to adjoining premises as may have resulted from such removal, and the cost of publication, if any, authorized by section 10 of this act, shall be deducted unless the owner shall, at his own expense, remove the same within such time as may be fixed by the court in the order confirming the report of the said committee as hereinbefore provided.

That each member of the committee of award appointed by the court as aforesaid shall receive for each day's attendance the sum of $5, and any vacancy caused by death, sickness, or disqualification may be filled by appointment by the court.

SEC. 15. That except as herein otherwise authorized all expenses incident to the enforcement of this act shall be paid from appropriations made from time to time for that purpose.

SEC. 16. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia were read, as follows:

Page 4, line 1, strike out the word "and" and insert in lieu thereof "or."

Page 4, line 13, insert after the word "after" the following: "ten and not exceeding," and insert after the word "days" the following: "in the discretion of the Commissioners."

Page 6, line 15, strike out the word "such" and insert in lieu thereof "carelessness or willful recklessness in the," and add after the word "demolition" the words "of such building."

Page 8, line 14, strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof "ten."

Page 12, lines 9 and 10, place parentheses before and after the words "as distinct from the ground rent."

Page 13, line 8, insert before the word "such" the words "carelessness or willful recklessness in."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wish to suggest to the chairman of the committee, and I will make a motion——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL], who made this report. I suggest, however, that in the first place we adopt the committee amendments and then take up the bill.

Mr. MORRELL. I move the adoption of the amendments as read by the Clerk.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] to give me five or ten minutes in order that I may refer to some provisions of the bill which, with great respect to the committee, seem to me very questionable.

Mr. MORRELL. I am perfectly willing to yield, but I suggest that the amendments be first acted on.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the question will be taken on the committee amendments.

The question being taken, the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wish to move an amendment.

Mr. MORRELL. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wish to suggest that the words "or unsafe" be inserted in the bill after the word "insanitary" where it occurs, and also that the words "or safe" be inserted after the word "sanitary" wherever it occurs.

Mr. MORRELL. I am perfectly willing to accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read the amendment as stated by Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRELL. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] for ten minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I never looked at this bill until the last five minutes, and I am somewhat unfamiliar with its provisions; but I wish to suggest to the members of the committee and of the House whether one section of the bill does not present a new phase of legislation and one of very questionable character?

It is all right to destroy insanitary buildings; that is done in every city, either by the owners of the buildings or by the proper authorities, whenever buildings become unsafe. But this bill, it seems to me, is unfairly in the interest of the owners of property that may have become worthless, because by the fourteenth section it is provided—what? That where a man owns a building that has become unsafe or insanitary—a building that in the ordinary progress of affairs in any city, so far as I know, he would himself be obliged by the authorities to pull down—that building can be destroyed under the direction of the authorities (which is all right), but then it is provided that this man shall be paid by the other people of the city—in other words, the cost of this building, which I submit can have no value, is to be paid by the other property owners.

It is provided in section 14 that there shall be a commission of award, and the rule of damages by which they are to be governed is fixed by the provisions of this bill. Take the third, for instance; if the commission finds that a building is unfit and not reasonably capable of being made fit for human habitation, is such a building of any value? Is it right that a man who owns a building unfit for human habitation, which he could sell to no one, should be allowed to have the public pay him for a value which does not exist? Yet the bill provides in section 14 that he shall be paid the value of the materials in the building.

Section 2 provides that where the building is in a state of defective sanitation he shall be paid the value of the building as it stands, deducting the expense necessary to put it in good repair.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the result of this legislation? What will be the practical result of section 14? Every man in the city of Washington who has property that has become unsafe and unfit for use, instead of pulling it down at his own cost, as is done in every other city in the land, will have his building declared unsafe, unfit for human habitation, which it is, and then a commission must be appointed, who are bound by the provisions of this bill to impose upon all the owners of real estate in Washington and the Government, which pays one-half of the expense, the cost of that property, of which the market value was not one cent.

I do not quite understand this bill, and coming from this committee as it does I criticise it with diffidence; but still I know somewhat about condemnation proceedings in cities and the value of property in cities.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from New York if he has read the first page of the bill, which provides the method of assessing damages in a case where a building is insanitary or is unfit and not reasonably capable of being made fit for human habitation.

Mr. PERKINS. I have read it, and that is what I criticise.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. What do you understand is the provision for the assessment of damages in the case of a building that is being used for illegal purposes, according to the first provision, which is in line 3 of page 12?

Mr. PERKINS. I will answer the gentleman from Massachusetts in this way: Here is a building that is being used in part for illegal purposes; here is a building which by the act of the owner is so used as to be dangerous or injurious to the health of the inmates. Why should the owner of a building who is overcrowding it, so that it is dangerous to the public, have any reparation or be allowed practically to sell his building to the public and get for it all it is worth, except the additional crowding he has put on? Practically, Mr. Speaker, this bill might be entitled "A bill to allow the owners of unfit, dangerous, insanitary buildings in the city of Washington to sell them to the public." That is what it comes to.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman answers my question, really, by asking another.

Mr. PERKINS. Possibly.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman whether he understands that a city or a State, exercising the right of eminent domain, has the right to take the property of the individual, unless the building or the property which he owns and is maintaining amounts to a public nuisance?

Mr. PERKINS. I understand that under the exercise of the police power, where a building can properly be condemned by the officers—I not only understand, but the gentleman knows as well as I do—that buildings that are insanitary, that breed disease in any great city can, if necessary, be destroyed under the exercise of the power of a board of health. The gentleman does not question that?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. By the exercise of the powers of the board of health.

Mr. PERKINS. In the exercise of the powers of a board of health, as part of the police power.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. That is, the city exercising the power, through the board of health, may require either a change in the condition of the building——

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Or failing to make a change in the condition of the building, may remove it.

Mr. PERKINS. Exactly; just as they can if a building is dangerous from the standpoint of protection against fire, as is done every day.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Now, does the gentleman understand that one of the purposes of this bill is to bring about the abolition of what are known as the alleys in the city of Washington?

Mr. PERKINS. I object to nothing in this bill except the provision in reference to compensation of owners of buildings that are legally condemned as being insanitary and unfit for use. Otherwise I sympathize with the bill. It is a good bill, but I believe that people who have no right to compensation under the law are given compensation by this bill. That is what I object to.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman mean to say that they are not entitled to compensation for the real estate that is condemned?

Mr. PERKINS. You do not condemn the fee of the land. You tear down the insanitary buildings. The fee remains in the owner, as it was before. He is keeping up a building that is practically a nuisance, because it is insanitary and unsafe. It is taken down, and then you turn around and pay him the value of the building, materials, and rental, less the overcrowding.

If you would leave the question of damages to be disposed of by the law and strike out the fourteenth section, I certainly should have no objection to the bill; but I can tell the gentleman what will happen if this bill becomes a law. If I had a building in Washington that was insanitary, if I wanted to get rid of that, as a man often does, for there is not a person familiar with cities who does not know that there are many owners of real estate whose buildings are worthless, I would have it condemned under this bill.

A man has got a building that is of no value, and he pulls it down that he may put up a better building. But in the city of Washington, by this law, he can have the property condemned, and instead of losing the value of the building the citizens of Washington will be obliged to pay at least the cost of the building material, which is about all the value of any building; and I do not see why that provision should be made.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I want to call the gentleman's attention to Paragraph A, on page 12, with reference to the cost of the building. Under the first provision—

> That the rental of the building was enhanced by reason of the same being used for legal purposes or being so overcrowded as to be dangerous or injurious to the health of the inmates; or, second, that the building is in a state of defective sanitation, or is not in reasonably good repair; or, third, that the building is unfit or not reasonably capable of being made fit for human habitation; and if the committee, or a majority of the members thereof, is satisfied by such evidence that compensation shall be awarded, then that the compensation, etc.

Now, the method by which the damages are to be assessed is as follows:

> Shall in the first place, so far as it is based on rental, be on the rental of the building (as distinct from the ground rent) which would have been obtained if the building had been occupied for legal purposes, and only by the number of persons whom the building was, under all the circumstances of the case, fitted to accommodate without such overcrowding as is dangerous or injurious to the health of the inmates.

Now, that provides that the party whose property is taken shall receive such a price as he would have been entitled to receive if the building had been legally occupied and not overcrowded. In other words, if it had been in a sanitary condition. Now, the same is true with reference to section 3. Then there was another provision here by which the party can not recover except the building be in such condition that it can be properly and legally used.

Now, I will ask the gentleman if that is not his construction of the language. In other words, is not there a provision to pay nobody for the property, except where it is legally and properly used?

Mr. PERKINS. I will answer the gentleman by saying that I think that the provision is all wrong. Let me state to the gentleman and the committee what it seems to me is a fair rule to be adopted. What is the condition? A man owns a building in the city of Washington; he illegally overcrowds it; he wants to get rid of it and get a new building. You tell him that he must cease his illegal overcrowding. That is all right. He refuses to do so. Then you destroy it.

Mr. MORRELL. Not necessarily, simply because he has overcrowded it.

Mr. PERKINS. You may destroy it.

Mr. MORRELL. There is nothing in the bill that forces a man to destroy the building simply because it is overcrowded.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, it provides that you may destroy it.

Mr. MORRELL. You are mistaken.

Mr. PERKINS. Then he is not entitled to any damages. If you do not do anything, he gets no damages.

Mr. MORRELL. Unless the commission takes forcible possession and destroys the building the owner gets no damage.

Mr. PERKINS. If you do not take forcible possession, then it is not a practical question. But the man is tired of his building. What happens? If he takes down his building and rebuilds it and makes it a wholesome building, then he gets nothing. He obeys the law; he makes the building sanitary; he stops overcrowding. He gets no pay. That is what he should do. But you offer a reward to him not to make it a good building. Here is a worthless building, and he will not stop overcrowding it, neither will he make it sanitary. He knows that if he does not do that the authorities will destroy that building and give him the money to start a new building. Under the provisions of your law he gets more for an utterly worthless building than anybody under God's heaven would give him except the authorities of Washington under this bill. Now, it may be that that is wise, but we would not have such a bill in Rochester.

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to say to the gentleman that if he disputes the law he is subject and amenable to the law and to the penalties prescribed in this bill of practically $100 per day. He can not keep on indefinitely disputing the law.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, no; but under this bill you yourselves go on and destroy the building.

Mr. MORRELL. Not necessarily.

Mr. PERKINS. But you have the power. That is the idea. Unless you do it, why, the bill does not amount to anything. If you pass a bill giving you authority to destroy a man's worthless building and do not destroy it, why, then the bill will be useless.

If you destroy an insanitary building, then you have got to pay him the value of it. Why? Why should a man be paid? Why should a man be paid the full value and cost of the building material, put up ten years before perhaps, of a building that is rotten and falling to the ground? Why should he? I do not see the wisdom of it. It seems to me the committee has acted hastily in framing this rule of damages. It is not the legal rule, it is not a practical rule, and it does not seem to me, Mr. Speaker, the right rule, with all due respect to the committee.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the gentleman's attention to one fact, that the provisions of this bill in this particular have been very carefully drawn and are almost the exact copy of the law in New York, a law which has stood the test of the common pleas courts of New York, and has been carried up from those courts to the court of appeals and stood the test there, and has been brought also, I believe, to the United States Supreme Court and stood the test there.

Mr. PERKINS. Your law is constitutional. The gentleman does not understand the objection. I think this law is a proper exercise of the police power; the law is constitutional. A similar law in the State of New York is constitutional. The trouble with your law is not the general provision, not the exercise of the police power, but paying a man for damages when he is not entitled to them.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the bill simply provide that damages shall be paid when actual physical possession is taken by the commissioners of a building which in the judgment of that commission can not be put in a sanitary condition.

Mr. PERKINS. But why should he be paid if the building can not be put in a sanitary condition?

Mr. MORRELL. This bill provides the owner shall simply be paid for the material.

Mr. PERKINS. That is all a building costs, the material.

Mr. MORRELL. Oh, no; it may be all it cost, but not its present value. The building has a rental value.

Mr. PERKINS. Which does not have to be paid. You don't pay for rental value and the value of the materials too. You take an insanitary building, and if a man would not like to sell such property for the value of the material he must be a good deal of a fool.

Mr. MORRELL. But the gentleman may not be aware that there are hundreds, perhaps thousands, of buildings to-day in Washington which, if this commission is created, would at once be declared insanitary—buildings which are to-day bringing in rentals.

Mr. PERKINS. What a godsend it will be to owners of unsanitary buildings. They will all sell them.

Mr. MORRELL. That may and may not be the case.

Mr. PERKINS. It will be the case.

Mr. MORRELL. Not at all.

Mr. PERKINS. You take a building which is unsafe and in danger of falling; there is not a man in this House living in a city who does not know buildings are constantly destroyed by the fire marshal who declares them to be unsafe and liable to fall. He gives notice to the owner to make it safe. If he does not make it safe within a certain time the city has the power to tear it down, but never is compensation made. The owner has the right to protect himself by making his building safe, and if he will not do that the building goes down, and the public does not have to buy it.

Mr. MORRELL. I think I might be safe in saying, Mr. Speaker, that there are a number of buildings which will come under the operation of this law the owners of which probably get for one year's rental as much as they would get for the materials which constitute the buildings if this law were put into effect and if these buildings were torn down.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman think, does the gentleman say here to the House of Representatives, that a man who owns an unsafe, unwholesome building, dangerous to the people of a city, dangerous to the community, has the right to keep that building there because he gets good rent and can complain because it is taken away from him? Is that the contention of the gentlemen?

Mr. MORRELL. The gentleman does not say so or think so, but I would like to say to the gentleman that that is exactly the evil which this bill is trying to get at. We desire to give this commission the power to go to work and take these buildings; if the owner refuses to tear them down, this commission shall have the power provided under this bill to tear down these buildings.

Mr. PERKINS. I will give you one prophecy: The owner of any one of these buildings, if he has proper counsel, will always refuse. You can bet your life on that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand the value of the materials is to be what they were when they were new, or the old materials?

Mr. MORRELL. No; just the value of the old materials as they then exist. I will now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I want to say one word, because I think my friend from New York misconceives the provisions of this bill. If a person residing in Washington is so occupying or using his building as to amount to a nuisance, that nuisance may be abated by the board of health. If the building is an insanitary building it may or may not amount to a nuisance. In other words, a building may be in such a condition, either by overcrowding or some other conditions which are not healthful, so as to constitute a nuisance, or it may not constitute a nuisance.

Now, the object of this bill is to permit the District of Columbia to condemn buildings, paying for the same according to the provisions of the bill. What are the provisions of this bill? The bill provides for the payment of damages. We pay for this property not what it is worth at its rental, if it was used for unlawful purpose, or when it is in an insanitary condition. It is a question for the jury to say what the property is worth if it be legally used, or used in such a manner as not to constitute an insanitary condition.

It is said that this bill affords an opportunity for owners to sell their buildings to the District of Columbia. Not at all. The District of Columbia is not bound to take the buildings unless it desires them. If the owners of buildings so conduct them and use them as to amount to a nuisance, or render them unsafe to public health, the board of health may condemn them. This legislation goes further, and provides that when a building is used illegally—for instance, for gambling—and when it is in an insanitary condition—if it is not in a sanitary condition, that we may proceed and condemn the property.

I do not understand that my friend from New York objects to the general purpose of the bill. The purpose of the bill is to reach buildings which the board of health can not reach and condemn and remove. It seems to me, under the circumstances, the amount of damages the owners are to receive is the amount which they are fairly entitled to under all the circumstances. I do not understand there is any provision in the bill which gives the owner of a building more than what the property is worth if legally and properly used. I assume that after the property has been condemned it is simply the value of the property for material. If the property can not be used in a sanitary condition, then it is of no value except as to the material. If it can be used for rebuilding, we are bound to take into consideration what is the value of the property for alteration or rebuilding.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. What would be the difference in measure of value in a proceeding of this sort and in one of ordinary condemnation, taking property for public use?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. There is not any difference.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Is it the purpose of this bill to give the owner of an insanitary or unsafe building the same compensation that the Government would pay if it wanted the property for public use?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. No; I should say that the rule is not the same as it would be where we condemn property without the restrictions contained in the bill. If we should condemn property that was insanitary, the rule would be the value of the property so condemned for any purpose for which it could be legally used. The bill provides that if it is insanitary the owner shall not receive the rent he receives when it was in the insanitary condition, but he shall be entitled to receive the value of the property—what it might be worth if put in proper condition and used in such condition. So it differs from the ordinary case of condemnation of individual property for public use. In other words, there are certain limitations contained in the bill.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Its being in an insanitary and an unsafe condition goes against the value of the property.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman I would like to say that, in my judgment, the reason why these different provisions are put in the bill in regard to condemnation is this, that in this bill we only proceed for the condemnation of the building. The fee remains in the original owner. We only provide in the bill for taking of the building itself or for the putting in proper repair of the building, or putting it into sanitary condition. We do not contemplate in this bill the taking by the Government of the fee of the ground upon which the building stands.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to one or two matters in this bill which I think will throw some light on the subject, and that is the penalty clause. I do not believe if this bill should become a law that in one case out of a hundred the District would remove a building. Section 13 says:

> That any person violating or aiding or abetting in violating any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof in the police court of the District of Columbia, upon information filed in the name of said District, be punished by a fine of not more than $100 or by imprisonment for not more than ninety days; and each day on which such unlawful act is done or during which such unlawful negligence continues shall constitute a separate and distinct offense.

Now, the prime object of the bill is, in the first place, to abate this unsanitary condition, and if the owners do not do it they are liable to a fine of not more than $100. Now, I want to say that the buildings attempted to be reached here are old shanties, of no value at all except for illegal and unsanitary purposes, for which they are being used now.

The bill provides further that in case the parties have refused to remove the buildings the District may do so. And what is the case then? That they shall have only such measure of damages as could be assessed if the property were used for sanitary and proper purposes. Now, if this property were used for that purpose it practically would be worth nothing. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, before that question is taken, I offer an amendment, simply to test this. I move to strike out in section 14, beginning at line 6 on page 11, the remainder of that section.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> On page 11, section 14, after line 6, strike out the remaining portion of the section.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, that amendment, if it prevails, will practically destroy the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, that amendment leaves in force every provision of the bill; it leaves in force the power to destroy insanitary buildings. The entire police authority provided by this bill is left untouched, and if any owner of this property has any right to compensation, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS] knows perfectly well that we could not take that right away if we tried. He knows perfectly well that if we destroy any property and the owner has a legal right to compensation, he will get his compensation, and no law passed by this Congress will prevent it.

What it does strike out is simply the measure of damages prescribed by this bill, which results in the owners of worthless property being put in a position where they can turn it over to the public and be paid by the public. I say to strike that out, and if they have any legal rights they will get them. This bill can be enforced just as well without this provision as with it, and I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS] knows that.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, if that is struck out, then it compels the District, if it wishes to condemn these buildings, to take the real estate.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, no.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Does not the gentleman from New York understand that that is the very thing we do not want to do—that we want to take the buildings and not the real estate?

Mr. PERKINS. My friend surely does not mean that at all, as good a lawyer as he is. He knows that where the public enters real estate and pulls down the buildings it does not buy the land. If the act of the public is illegal, then the corporation is liable for the value of the property destroyed.

When, for instance, the public enters, as it constantly does, to destroy a building on the claim of the fire marshal that it is unsafe, and it is pulled down, and the owner claims the building was safe and complied with the regulations, he sues the corporation. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS] does not claim for one moment that he sues for the value of the land. He sues for trespass, for illegally destroying his building, and if he recovers he gets the value of his building. If the public can show that the action of the officer in tearing the building down was in conformity with law, then the owner gets nothing, and that will be the case here. Surely my friend knows that.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am a little astonished at the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] when he says that the owners of property have their recourse for damages to the property taken and at the same time moves an amendment to strike out this provision which protects the District and protects the public and prescribes the rules and regulations under which such proceedings shall be taken, and further says that no estimate of damages shall be considered except it is based upon the sanitary and proper condition of the property.

In other words, in the case of these little shanties which are renting for from 25 to 50 per cent of their value every year, are overcrowded, where a great many people are living in the same room, and they are in an insanitary and unhealthful condition, with no proper sewer connections, this bill provides a remedy, and says that no damages shall be considered except they are on the basis of the buildings being in a sanitary condition. Now, to strike that out will be striking a blow at the District and at the very safeguards of the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I think the gentleman is entirely wrong, if I may be permitted to say so.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

CRUELTY TO CERTAIN ANIMALS.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10417) to prevent cruelty to certain animals in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to dock the tail of any horse within the District of Columbia, or to procure the same to be docked, or to import or bring into this District any docked horse or horses, and it shall also be unlawful to drive, work, use, race, or deal in any unregistered docked horse or horses within the District of Columbia, not registered within ninety days after the passage of this act, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That within ninety days after the passage of this act every owner or user of any docked horse within the District of Columbia shall register his or her docked horse or horses by filing in the office of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia a certificate, which certificate shall contain the name or names of the owner, together with his or her post-office address, a full description of the color, age, size, and the use made of such docked horse or horses, which certificate shall be signed by the owner or his or her agent. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall number such certificates consecutively and record the same in a book or register to be kept for that purpose only, and shall receive as a fee for the recording of such certificate the sum of 50 cents.

SEC. 3. That the driving, working, keeping, racing, having in possession, or using of any unregistered docked horse or horses after ninety days after the passage of this act shall be deemed prima facie evidence of the fact that the party driving, working, keeping, racing, or using such unregistered docked horse or horses docked the tail of such horse or horses.

SEC. 4. That any person or persons violating any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine in a sum not less than $100 nor more than $500, or by imprisonment in the workhouse not less than thirty days or more than ninety days for each offense, or by both such fine and imprisonment. For the purposes of this act the word "docking" wherever used shall refer to the cutting of the bone of the tail of the horse.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. DALZELL rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Is the District Committee serious in reporting this bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. The committee has reported it, and I think it is a serious matter.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman believe that we can by law prevent a man from bringing his own property into the District of Columbia——

Mr. BABCOCK. I will refer the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS], who is, I believe, prepared to cite some legal authorities.

Mr. DALZELL. If I understand the bill—perhaps I misunderstood it—then under this provision if I happen to own a horse with a docked tail and bring it into the District of Columbia and keep it here a certain length of time I become guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to fine and imprisonment.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. That is a provision of the bill. The case is exactly the same as if my friend from Pennsylvania had shot a bird in Pennsylvania in an open season and brought it here during a closed season. If he did so, he would find himself liable to a penalty.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, I do not see any analogy.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. This bill, which originated with the Washington Humane Society, is in every respect, with the exception of the provision to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has called attention, the same kind of legislation that has been enacted in most of the States of the Union.

Now, the provision which provides a penalty in case a docked horse is brought into this District hereafter is a provision absolutely necessary for the proper enforcement of the bill. Of course there is no question that Congress under its police power has the right to pass a measure of this kind. Nearly all the States in the North have passed bills of this character.

I understand that certain States bordering on the District of Columbia have not enacted any penalty for docking the tails of horses. If the provision which has been referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania were omitted from this bill, the penalty referred to could not be enforced, because anyone might take a horse over into Maryland and have its tail docked there and then bring the horse back to the District of Columbia. The purpose of the provision to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has called attention is to enable the authorities to enforce this act.

There are plenty of precedents for provisions of this kind. You will find the precedents everywhere in our game laws.

Take such a case as I referred to a short time ago where it would not be a misdemeanor to kill certain game in Virginia, yet if the game after being killed should be brought into this District at certain seasons of the year the person having possession of the game would be liable to a penalty. The claim is made that those provisions are necessary in order to enforce the penalties in the law. The enactment of this bill without such a provision would be of no avail.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Why does not the gentleman report a bill making it a misdemeanor to clip the ears of a bull terrier? Bull terriers are just as important animals as horses.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Well, I am not sure but that if the gentleman would offer such a provision as an amendment to this bill I would accept it.

Mr. PERKINS. Let me ask the gentleman another question. Why should it be a misdemeanor to have a horse docked any more than to have your own hair cut?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. This is a question that has been discussed for the last fifty years——

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman think that it hurts the horse at all?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. This question, I say, has been discussed for the last fifty years in this country, and there is not a humane society or, so far as I know, not a person in this country who does not believe that the docking of a horse is an act of cruelty to the animal.

Mr. PERKINS. Did the gentleman ever see a horse's tail docked? Does he know what the operation is?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Why, I will say to the gentleman that I never could afford to own a horse, and I do not expect to be able to own one while I am a Member of Congress.

Mr. PERKINS. But you may have seen other people's horses.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I have seen other people's horses.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman knows perfectly well, and everybody knows, that this talk about its hurting a horse is just rot and nothing else. I think it a little tiresome for us to spend our time passing silly legislation of this sort simply because it is asked for by a lot of foolish women who do not know a horse from a cow.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to say a word right there?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have heard a veterinarian of standing say that it did hurt a horse, and that he thought the whole process was an outrage.

Mr. PERKINS. Then that veterinarian of standing must have been a very ignorant veterinarian, because I have seen many a veterinarian perform this operation. I have seen a horse standing eating his oats and never stop eating them while the operation went on. I have seen that time and time again.

Mr. GRIGGS. Well, that was a hungry horse. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. This talk about the docking of horses being cruel comes from people who do not know anything about it, and it makes me tired. That is all I can say about it.

Mr. HITT. The horse would stop eating his oats if it were hot weather and he had been docked and was tormented by flies until he was nearly crazy, as anybody can see who will visit the pastures just outside the city, where horses which have their tails left in the natural state can go out and pasture, while the docked horses are blanketed or kept closely shut up to be protected from the tormenting flies. [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. If my friend wants to know what to do in order to stop flies troubling horses, let him pass a law to compel them to be blanketed, as every man does who has a decent horse. It keeps off the flies ten thousand times more that all this talk about the flicking of a horse's tail around his hind quarters. But these humane societies do not think of that. They say, "We will pass a bill in the Congress of the United States providing that it is cruelty to dock a horse's tail."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. PERKINS. I will if I know how.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why does anybody dock a horse's tail?

Mr. PERKINS. First, because it looks a great deal better. Why do you cut your hair, instead of having it down over your shoulders? [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is the cruelest question I have been asked in a great many years. [Laughter.] As a gentleman in my city used to say, "That is very unwrong." [Laughter.] But I never could see why on earth anybody wanted to dock a horse's tail. There is no more sense in it than there is in the practice of the Chinese, who bind the feet of their female children. Both practices are cruel, and, in my judgment, one is just exactly as senseless as the other.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Chinese for generations have followed that practice simply because some people in remote times followed it. Now, the docking of the tail of a horse and the making it curl up into a short stub because Lord Flubdub, somewhere over in England, a few generations ago did it——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Or Earl Snob.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; that does not prevent it from being cruel. It does not make the horse look better. There is no earthly reason for it that I can see.

Mr. PERKINS. Will you answer a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. A man has a right to dress himself or to dress his horse as he pleases. I do not suppose Congress is going to pass a law saying we shall wear red cravats or blue cravats, or that our harness shall be black or yellow. This law can only stand upon one proposition, and that is that docking is cruelty to animals.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman know that there are nerves that run down to the end of the bone in the horse's tail, and does not the cutting of a nerve involve pain?

Mr. PERKINS. Time after time I have seen horses that went right straight along eating their oats. When a little cocaine is used, they do not know the difference. Now, let me say that if the House of Representatives is going to pass a law to prevent cruelty to horses, let it pass a law that is good for something. These people who come here and cry about docking horses, saying it is cruel, nine-tenths of them keep their horses in constant torture every moment by the use of an overhead check, which holds the head back. Let the Committee on the District of Columbia report a bill forbidding the use of overhead checks. They will save the horses ten thousand times as much torment as they will by such a bill as this. Let us be sensible and pass a bill that is worth something instead of such a bill as this, simply because it is asked for by some female society.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would like to ask the committee why it can not leave out these words, "or to import or to bring into this District any docked horse or horses." I have no objection to the authorities of the District of Columbia saying that we shall have no more horses docked here, but my taste runs to docked horses, and all the horses I own are docked. If you will simply pass a law that all horses docked shall be registered, I have no objection to offer. And I have no objection to your saying that horses shall not be docked in the District of Columbia; but I do not think you ought to exclude a man who already owns horses from bringing them here if they are docked, when he is a careful man who takes good care of his horses. If you strike out these words, you will do away with much of the trouble.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to say to the gentleman that any amendment in the line he suggests would destroy the bill. I would suggest to the gentleman that he vote against the bill and kill it if he does not like it, because that amendment is unnecessary and it would do no good.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not see that that applies at all and the bill can be properly amended. I shall vote against it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MINOR. I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. PERKINS. All right.

Mr. MINOR. Are you really serious when you say to this House that the cutting off of a horse's tail is not cruel—that is, painless?

Mr. PERKINS. If it is properly done, it is painless.

Mr. MINOR. With bone, with muscle, with nerves, and with veins clear through it?

Mr. PERKINS. Properly done, with the use of cocaine, it is painless.

Mr. MINOR. Now, that is a strange statement to make, having personal knowledge.

Mr. PERKINS. I have seen it done many times.

Mr. MINOR. I do not propose to argue with the gentleman, because he may be better informed than I am on the subject and have personal knowledge.

Mr. PERKINS. I have seen lots of horses operated on.

Mr. BABCOCK. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I was raised with very high notions about the perfection and complete perfection of the works of the Almighty on an early occasion when he planned out, among other things, the dumb animals of this world. I am now driven to believe, if I am to take the opinion of the gentleman from New York, that if God Almighty had only had some wise advice before he would have made a horse with a tail sticking right up. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. No, I do not say that; but I stated it was not cruelty to animals. Now, some may like to dock his horse, but you like it with a long tail.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am in favor of an acknowledgment of the universal and supreme wisdom of the Almighty.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, you do not follow it in many respects.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I come as near to it as you do.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for a vote.

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to ask the gentleman who reported this bill whether or not he does not think that the second section well might be amended, so that a man may not be prohibited from bringing horses in after the expiration of ninety days; and also if he does not think it would open the door to fraud in the sale of certificates of registration, and be rather hard upon those who may be obliged, from their being elected to an official life, or being sent here, or obliged to come here, that they shall, if they have at home a docked horse, be obliged to leave it there and walk when they come to Washington? Or if they have a horse at home and they are fond of him, if he is docked, they can not bring that horse here, and they will have to sell that horse, and when they come here if they want to have one be compelled to buy a horse with a long tail, whatever he may look like?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. The bill provides for the registering of docked horses which are now here. It simply requires that the Commissioners should do this. A man can not come to the District if he owns a docked horse and bring it. He must, if he needs a horse here, bring one with a long tail. I do not think there is any difficulty about the question. My friend from Ohio takes the position that God's plan is the best, and I shall be glad if the House will agree with the views of the gentleman from Ohio. I do not see why there should be any further trouble about the enforcement of this law than there is about the enforcement of any penal statute.

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that it is unjust and illegal to make a provision that a man who is obliged to come here after the expiration of these ninety days who wants to bring his horses shall not be able to bring them unless they have long tails.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PERKINS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 8.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF ISSUE OF LICENSES FOR TURKISH, RUSSIAN, AND MEDICATED BATHS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the Members of the House that we have only one more bill, but it is a very important measure, and particularly the Members of the House are interested in it. I call up the bill H. R. 10669.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10669) to regulate the issue of licenses for Turkish, Russian, or medicated baths in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 30 of section 7 of "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"PAR. 30. That owners or managers of massage establishments and Turkish, Russian, or medicated baths shall pay a license tax of $25 per annum: Provided, That no license shall be issued under this paragraph without the approval of the major and superintendent of police: Provided further, That it shall be unlawful for any female to give or administer massage treatment or any bath to any person of the male sex, or for any person of the male sex to give or administer massage treatment or any bath to any person of the female sex, in any establishment licensed under this paragraph. Any person violating the provisions of this paragraph shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than $40 nor more than $500 for each offense, or by imprisonment for not less than thirty nor more than one hundred and eight days, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and, in addition to such penalty, it shall be the duty of the assessor to revoke the license of the owner or manager of the establishment wherein the provisions of this paragraph shall have been violated."

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Page 2, line 7, strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "one."

Page 2, line 9, strike out the words "one hundred and eight" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ninety."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed, and I move to lay that motion on the table, and to have that apply to the several bills which have been called up by the District Committee to-day.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL NAVAL OFFICER IN DISTRICT OF CHICAGO.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 540, which is the same as the bill H. R. 4818, which has been unanimously reported by the Ways and Means Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to consider the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 540) providing for an additional officer in the district of Chicago, in the collection district of Indiana and Illinois.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be in the district of Chicago, in the collection district of Indiana and Illinois, in addition to the officers now provided for by law, a naval officer for the district, who shall perform the duties pertaining to that office, and shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if any committee has considered the bill.

Mr. BOUTELL. The bill is unanimously reported by the Ways and Means Committee, and is also recommended by the Treasury Department, and the bill under consideration is the bill which has already passed the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The similar bill, being H. R. 4818, will lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. BOUTELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TO AMEND ACT IN RELATION TO FIFTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 9648.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9648) to amend the first section of an act providing that the circuit court of appeals for the fifth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, approved January 30, 1903.

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of the act providing that the circuit court of appeals for the fifth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, approved January 30, 1903, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the concluding words of said section, to wit, "on the first Monday in September in each year," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "on the third Monday in October in each year."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to consider this bill at this time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS OF UNITED STATES AT ALBANY, GA.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill H. R. 5498.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5498) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Albany, Ga.

Be it enacted, etc., That the southwestern division of the northern judicial district of Georgia is hereby established, to be composed of the counties of Baker, Clay, Early, Quitman, Randolph, Terrell, and Webster, of the northern district of Georgia, and of Berrien, Calhoun, Colquitt, Decatur, Dougherty, Lee, Mitchell, and Worth, of the southern district of Georgia.

SEC. 2. That a term of the circuit court and of the district court for the northern district of Georgia shall be held at Albany, in said State, on the second Mondays in June and December in each year; and it shall be the duty of the clerk, marshal, and other officers of the northern judicial district to attend said terms of said court and perform all the duties pertaining to their positions, and no additional clerk or marshal shall be appointed in said district. If, in the opinion of the court, it shall become necessary, a deputy clerk may be appointed: Provided, however, That suitable rooms and accommodations are furnished for the holding of said courts free of expense to the Government of the United States.

SEC. 3. That all suits not of a local nature in the circuit and district courts against a single defendant, inhabitant of said State, must be brought in the division of the district where he resides; but if there are two or more defendants residing in different divisions of the district such suits may be brought in either division. All issues of fact in said suits shall be tried at a term of the court held in the division where the suit is so brought.

SEC. 4. That prosecutions for crime or offenses hereafter committed in any of the counties of the southwestern division shall be cognizable within such division; and all prosecutions for crime or offenses heretofore committed within either of said counties, taken as aforesaid from the southern district, or committed in the northern district as hitherto constituted, shall be commenced and proceeded with as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 5. That all civil suits and proceedings now pending in the circuit or district courts of either district or division from which the counties constituting this division have been taken, and which would, if instituted after the passage of this act, be required to be brought in the southwestern division of said district, may be transferred by consent of all parties or by order of the court to said southwestern division of said district and there disposed of in the same manner and with like effect as if the same had been instituted therein; and all processes, writs, and recognizances relating to such suits and proceedings so transferred shall be considered as belonging to the term of the court in the southwestern division of said district in the same manner and with like effect as if they had been issued or taken in reference thereto originally.

SEC. 6. That in all cases of removal of suits from the courts of the State of Georgia to the courts of the United States in the northern district of Georgia such removal shall be to the United States courts in the division in which the county is situated from which the removal is made, and the time within which the removal shall be perfected, in so far as it refers to or is regulated by the terms of the United States courts, shall be deemed to refer to the terms of the United States courts in such division.

SEC. 7. That all grand and petit jurors summoned for service in each division shall be residents of such division. All mesne and final process, subject to the provision hereinbefore contained, issued in either of said divisions, may be served and executed in either or all of said divisions.

SEC. 8. That this act shall be in force from and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1905.

SEC. 9. That the counties of Berrien, Colquitt, Calhoun, Decatur, Dougherty, Lee, Mitchell, and Worth be, and the same are hereby, transferred from the southern to the northern district of Georgia.

SEC. 10. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

On page 1, line 5, strike out the word "Baker;" and in the same line, after the word "Terrell," insert the word "Miller."

In lines 6 and 7, of the same page, strike out the word "Berrien" and insert in place thereof the word "Baker."

In line 7, same page, strike out the words "Decatur" and "Colquitt."

On page 4, line 6, strike out the word "Colquitt;" and in the same line strike out the word "Berrien" and insert in place thereof the word "Baker."

In line 7 of the same page strike out the word "Decatur."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRIGGS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SESSIONS OF CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8335) to amend an act entitled "An act to determine the sessions of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin," approved March 31, 1892, chapter 28.

Be it enacted, etc., That said act, entitled "An act providing the terms and places of holding the courts of the United States in the eastern district of Wisconsin," approved March 31, 1892, be amended so as to read as follows:

"That the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin shall be held at the times and places following: At Milwaukee on the first Mondays of January and October, and at Oshkosh on the second Tuesday in June of each year, and at Green Bay the first Tuesday in April of each year."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MINOR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

APPEALS FROM CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS, BEAUMONT, TEX.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10145) to provide for appeals, writs of error, and other appellate proceedings from the circuit and district courts of Beaumont, in the eastern district of Texas.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all appeals, writs of error, and other appellate proceeding which may hereafter be taken or prosecuted from the circuit or district courts of the United States from the courts at Beaumont, Jefferson County, Tex., in the eastern judicial district of Texas, to the court of appeals of the fifth circuit shall be heard and disposed of by said court of appeals at the terms of court held in the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the court from hearing appeals or writs of error wherever the said court shall sit in cases of injunctions and in all other cases which under the statutes and the rules or in the opinion of the court are entitled to be brought to a speedy hearing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HENRY of Texas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PORTO RICAN TEACHERS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of joint resolution No. 79, for the transportation of Porto Rican teachers to the United States and return.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, during the year 1904, at such time as requested by the governor of the island of Porto Rico, to transport from the island of Porto Rico to the United States and to return from the United States to Porto Rico, on one of the vessels engaged in the transport service of the United States, not to exceed 600 of the Porto Rican teachers in the public schools of said island, and in addition thereto not to exceed 25 necessary attendants, such teachers and attendants to be selected by the commissioner of education of said island, for the purpose of attending the various summer schools of the universities, colleges, and other institutions of learning in the United States during said year: Provided, That a subsistence charge of $1 per day for each day on such vessel shall be collected from each of such persons so transported; and that the Government of the United States shall not be liable for, and shall not defray, the expenses of said teachers and attendants, or of any such of them, incurred while in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I object.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will not the gentleman from Mississippi withdraw or reserve his objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will reserve it if the gentleman wants to talk.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will not the gentleman from Mississippi state the ground of his objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Wisconsin can have time to talk if he chooses.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not want to take the time of the House if the gentleman is to object.

The SPEAKER. This is proceeding by unanimous consent.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the disposition of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, the bill H. R. 11128, to modify and amend an agreement with the Devils Lake Indians in North Dakota be made the special order, and that it continue the special order, not to interfere with revenue or appropriation bills or bills on the Private Calendar or with any business that is privileged under the rules, and that the bill be considered in the House.

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill is similar to the one passed this morning?

Mr. MARSHALL. Very similar, except it provides for opening of a smaller reservation.

Mr. PAYNE. And there are similar guards in the bill?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman state about how many acres are involved?

Mr. MARSHALL. One hundred and four thousand acres.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if this makes any charge on the public Treasury different because of the fact that the proceeds of sale of public land now goes to the fund for reclaiming arid land? By reason of that irrigation act is not this now a direct charge on the Treasury?

Mr. MARSHALL. There is a charge on the Treasury precisely similar to the one in the Rosebud bill, which has been passed, and that is to pay for sections 16 and 36, which are ceded to the State of North Dakota for school purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The provision in the gentleman's bill making appropriations out of the Treasury for sections 16 and 36, taken from the Indians and turned over to the settlers at so much an acre, is that the Treasury of the United States is asked to give a certain sum similar to the one in the bill passed Saturday.

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not recognize the changed conditions now with reference to the Treasury of the United States and a charge on the general fund from what it was before we passed the irrigation bill in this: That before we passed the irrigation bill the proceeds from the sale of public lands went into the general Treasury, and now he is asking the Treasury to appropriate money, although that Treasury does not receive the proceeds of the sales of public lands? Am I not correct in that changed condition now?

Mr. MARSHALL. I will yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, the question of disposing of the public lands in the interest of irrigation is not connected with the disposal of any of the Indian reservations.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; but this is what I mean: Prior to the irrigation act the proceeds of the sale of public lands went into the Treasury of the United States, and now it goes into a reclamation fund. Before that we had a fund out of which we could pay for sections 16 and 36, and in cases similar to the one now presented. But now that fund is diverted or placed in the irrigation fund, and so this means a direct appropriation without any reimbursement to the National Treasury, if I am correct in my assumption.

Mr. MARTIN. In the previous legislation the appropriation made out of the Treasury was a direct appropriation. Before the irrigation act was passed the fund did not pass from the sale of public lands to the payment for school lands. That was not the case. The appropriation was always a direct appropriation, where, under the enabling act, the Government was obligated to make good to the State sections 16 and 36. In the enabling act under which North Dakota and South Dakota were admitted into the Union there was a clause in it different from that under which any other State was admitted into the Union prior to that time upon the subject of school lands, and it is expressly anticipated in that enabling act—owing, no doubt, to the fact that the conditions of these particular States were peculiar in that large areas of the State when admission took place were Indian lands—that as Indian reservations should be removed the Government would make good to the States sections 16 and 36.

This bill to which the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. MARSHALL] has now reference does not provide for the payment to the State of any appropriation out of the General Government, but it does provide for the completion and fulfillment of the contract of the Government in that enabling act to purchase from the Indians these particular sections 16 and 36, and to place them at the disposal of the State for general public school purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me ask the gentleman why it is that in fixing the price of the land as the bill now before the House fixes it he does not fix the price sufficiently high so that resort will not be needed to the general fund in the Treasury?

Mr. MARTIN. That would be a very unjust provision, I think, where in an enabling act like the one in question the Government has bound itself along a general line of policy which has been pursued ever since the ordinance of 1787, namely, to set aside sections 16 and 36 in new States as they should be admitted for the benefit of school funds. I think to do differently would be a very improper hardship on the settlers, who must take the other sections, and that the expense of these particular sections should not be loaded off onto the settlers instead of the obligation being fulfilled by the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman's position might be well taken, except there is a change in the conditions, and that I present to him for explanation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] will permit me, I would state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] that the irrigation act does not provide that this reclamation fund shall belong to the States. It still belongs to the National Government, and upon the construction of any reservoir or any irrigation enterprise the persons who settle on the lands under that reservoir pay back to the Government every dollar of cost. It does not cost the Government a cent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman recognizes, however, that that is a departure from the real question here. Where does the National Government get the fund out of which to pay the obligation provided for in this bill? It is clearly evident that it does not get it now from the public lands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Government gets it from the fund put aside for reclamation purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remind the House that this is a request for special order, making it in order to consider this bill under the terms reported by the Clerk. A discussion of the merits of the bill would go only far enough, of course, to enable the gentlemen to see whether there is objection to making the special order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, with that view in mind, I desire to ask the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. MARSHALL] a question. This bill does just what has been done in the other States, does it not? In Indiana and Mississippi and all the States certain lands were bought from the Indians and then given by the Federal Government to the States for educational purposes.

Mr. MARSHALL. It goes even further than that. Under the enabling act by which North and South Dakota were admitted, provision was made that as fast as these reservations were opened up these school sections——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But independently of the enabling act, and supposing that had never existed, still this bill does nothing except what has been done in connection with every State admitted into the Union since Tennessee. Lands previously bought from the Indians and paid for by the Federal Government are handed over to the States for educational purposes.

Mr. LACEY. It is two sections now instead of one.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; two sections now instead of one, but a great many have gotten two.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HITT rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois to suspend for a moment to ascertain whether he is willing to allow a joint resolution to be considered on request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] by unanimous consent, which joint resolution has already been reported?

Mr. HITT. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will again be reported.

The Clerk again reported the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. When I objected before, I understood that the Federal Government or the treasury of Porto Rico was to pay the expenses of these people. As I have ascertained that such is not the case, I have no objection.

There being no further objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HITT. Before making the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, I ask unanimous consent that an order be made for the reprint of the bill and the accompanying report, as they are nearly exhausted.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the order for a reprint will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. HITT. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of revenue bills, and especially to consider the bill (H. R. 11287) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. LACEY in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 11287, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The title of the bill having been reported,

Mr. HITT. I move to dispense with the first or formal reading of the bill, so that we may proceed at once with the discussion.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, as it is probable there will be a desire for some general discussion before we take up this bill by paragraphs, I will now first briefly explain its provisions, and then I trust I can arrange with my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] as to the time that may be desired for general debate.

This is the bill annually reported to provide for our service, both diplomatic and consular, throughout the world. There being a rule of the House which restricts very closely the power of amendment by the committee or even by the House except by unanimous consent, not many changes have been proposed in the existing law, and those changes are as usual chiefly in the way of increase of salary or other provision for the service.

The committee has been very sparing in making these increases of salaries all through. About eighty increases were recommended by the State Department. The committee, knowing that the House is always jealous in regard to any departure from its fixed standing rule on this subject, have proposed an increase in only a few cases, where such a provision was manifestly necessary, its action covering only thirteen consuls-general and four consulates among the eighty recommended. Some small sums have been added to the provision in the larger offices to enable the consuls to have more clerical assistance. As the whole service has enlarged year by year, the contingent expenses have increased, so that the provision for the "contingent expense of the foreign missions" is $10,000 more than last year, and that for contingent expenses of consulates is increased $40,000.

The salaries I will not go over. Anyone who takes an interest in the details will find them given in the report with descriptive remarks and the reason in each case for the increase, and at the close of the report is a tabulated statement giving every one of the items, both of increase and diminution. I may say briefly and generally that the whole provision for our foreign service is enlarged only $28,550. The bill appropriates $1,996,600.69.

The bill is so familiar to most of the Members and its provisions are so little changed from what they were in previous Congresses that I will not take up further time, save to add that every one of these changes has been made after very careful consideration in the subcommittee and by the unanimous vote of the full committee.

Now, I will ask my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] whether we can arrange about the time for general debate, if gentlemen desire such debate.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to discuss this bill myself; but a number of gentlemen on this side have expressed to me a wish to make some remarks. I suppose we might let the matter run on this afternoon, and if there are those here who want to speak they can do so.

Mr. HITT. Then the gentleman can yield his time. We will let the debate run for a while, and then we will make an agreement.

Mr. DINSMORE. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] wishes to make some remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] desire to control half the time?

Mr. DINSMORE. No; I prefer that the chairman of the committee control the time, unless he desires me to take charge of that on this side.

Mr. HITT. I suggest that the gentleman take his hour, and afterwards we can arrange it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois to reserve his time.

Mr. HITT. Yes.

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] such time as he desires.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of this opportunity to address the committee upon a question which is not now directly before us for discussion, but a question, I think, that the American people are more directly interested in at the present time than any other. I refer to our position in relation to Colombia, Panama, and the Panama Canal.

In my opinion a very large majority of the American people, regardless of party or locality, are anxious, and have been these many years, for a canal to be built across the Isthmus of Panama by the American people and maintained and controlled by the American people. This much, I think, must be conceded by all.

The time for constructing this canal has been already too long delayed. But it were better that the waters of the two oceans should not commingle for years yet to come than that any portion of the canal should be constructed under conditions which will be to the everlasting disgrace of our good name and to the dishonor of the American Republic, in that the same will be done without law and without right, and in violation of the eternal principles of justice, which should always prevail in our conduct with all nations and with all people. We can not afford to have our good name called in question. We should avoid the appearance even of wrongdoing.

Are we, in this miserable Panama fiasco, sustaining the dignity, honor, and glory of the American Republic? Are we not rather attempting, by special pleading, to establish a defense whereby we may screen and conceal our real position? An unbiased, even if brief, consideration of the facts and circumstances attending the birth and nurture of the stillborn Panama Republic may help us to determine our real status.

The Republic of Colombia, formerly New Granada, is a little South American Republic with 5,000,000 people; Panama, the newcomer, a smaller one still, with 250,000 people.

A treaty was entered into between the United States and New Granada in 1846, and Colombia later succeeded to the rights and obligations under this treaty with New Granada. That treaty contained, among many other things not necessary now to be referred to for the purpose I have in mind, the following reciprocal agreements:

ARTICLE XXXV, PROVISO 4.

If any one or more of the citizens of either party shall infringe any of the articles of this treaty, such citizens shall be held personally responsible for the same, and the harmony and good correspondence between the nations shall not be interrupted thereby, each party engaging in no way to protect the offender or sanction such violation.

Each Republic assumed in this treaty certain responsibilities and duties sacred as any obligations republics can assume. New Granada guaranteed to the United States that travel and transit across the Isthmus of Panama should be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States, and in case there should be interruption of the free transit "each party engages in no way to protect the offender or sanction the violation."

New Granada was bound to prevent any interference by her citizens with travel across the Isthmus, and the United States bound herself to defend the sovereignty of New Granada.

And again, supposing either of these high contracting parties should for any reason fail to keep its agreement, what was to happen? This possible condition was carefully provided for in the compact itself in these words, which we should keep clearly in mind when we are attempting to ascertain the true status of the deplorable situation down there on November 2, 1903.

Provision 5 states:

If, unfortunately, any of the articles contained in this treaty should be violated or infringed in any way whatever it is expressly stipulated that neither of the two contracting parties shall ordain or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor shall declare war against the other on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall have laid before the other a statement of such injuries and damages, verified by competent proofs, demanding satisfaction, and the same shall have been denied in violation of the laws and of international right.

It plainly appears from this provision what the United States had a right to do and what she had not a right to do in the event that New Granada did not keep her agreement and protect travel across the Isthmus. The United States could lay before New Granada "a statement of her injuries and damages, and demand satisfaction," but until that had been done she could not "ordain or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war," by intervention or otherwise.

Bearing in mind that the United States had guaranteed to New Granada "the rights of sovereignty and property which she had over the territory," we are called upon to decide what was our duty toward New Granada in the event that some of her citizens should attempt to interfere with free travel across the Isthmus. New Granada had agreed to keep the way open and free and to pay damages if she failed to do it, and this agreement we had accepted. Is there any question that she not only had this right, but that it was her duty under the compact to keep this way open, and to punish such of her citizens as might interfere and prevent an open and free transit; that she was to preserve order and protect travel there? If the United States was to do anything in the premises in case of threatened interference with free travel across the Isthmus on the part of a little body of Colombian insurgents, was it not our "plain duty" to assist New Granada in maintaining her sovereignty, that she might keep the compact made with us? This was no new question. We had done it several times before under similar circumstances. If we but exercise our natural sense of justice and right, we can arrive at no other conclusion.

I submit that it is impossible to so torture language as to read into this treaty any right on our part to prevent Colombia from keeping or restoring order and protecting travel across the Isthmus. But fortunately we are not without the best of authority for this contention.

In 1856 they had a riot down there in Panama, and, by the way, they have had riots or insurrections in Panama about as frequently as there has been a change of the moon. Well, in 1857, the next year after the riot, the United States and Colombia had a treaty for the purpose of adjusting the claims which we made for losses caused by the riot, and in that treaty they made use of this language:

All claims, and especially those for damages which were caused by the riot at Panama on the 15th day of April, 1856, for which the said Government of New Granada acknowledges its liability arising out of its privileges and obligations to preserve peace and order along the transit route.

This shows where the duty to deal with insurrections was then thought to rest by those who represented the United States.

But let us come down a little later and get another well-recognized authority for our contention.

On April 30, 1866, Secretary Seward wrote to our minister at Bogota as follows:

The United States desires nothing else, nothing better, and nothing more in regard to the State of Colombia than the enjoyment on their part of complete and absolute sovereignty and independence. If these great interests should ever be assailed at home or abroad, the United States—

Will do what? Send an armed force by land and by sea to blow up the first boat and shoot the first soldier who shall attempt to quell the riot, restore order, and reestablish an open and free transit across the Isthmus? Not at all, but—will be ready, cooperating with the Government and their ally, to maintain and defend them.

Again, on October 27, 1873, Secretary Fish said, referring to the provisions we are now discussing:

It is regarded as the undoubted duty of the Government of Colombia to protect the way against attacks from local insurgents. The discharge of that duty will be insisted upon.

Again, and later on, Secretary Bayard, in referring to this same matter, said:

On several occasions the Government of the United States, at the instance and always with the assent of Colombia, has, in times of civil tumult, sent its armed forces to the Isthmus of Panama to preserve American citizens and property along the transit from injuries which the Government of Colombia might, at the time, be unable to prevent. But, in taking such steps, this Government has always recognized the sovereignty and obligations of Colombia in the premises, and has never acknowledged, but on the contrary expressly disclaimed, any duty of protecting the transit against domestic disturbance.

President Cleveland, in his annual message of December, 1885, took the same ground, and President Roosevelt, in one of his sane and calm intervals, when not actuated with a desire to astonish the world by his ability to do things others would never dream of, nor to emphasize the strenuosity of his remarkable personality, declared in his message to Congress in 1902 that—

No independent nation in America need have the slightest fear of aggression from the United States. It behooves each to maintain order within its own borders and to discharge its just obligations to foreigners. When this is done, be they strong or weak, they have nothing to dread from outside interference.

I have cited the highest authority in support of the contention I make, and I assert that no man can cite any authority whatever to the contrary.

Thus we see that the mandates of justice, right, and honor required us, in compliance with the terms of the treaty, in case there was insurrection in Panama which threatened the sovereignty of Colombia and impaired the right to free transit across the Isthmus, to acknowledge the sovereignty of Colombia and, if we were to take any actual part at all in the controversy there, to aid Colombia in restoring order and keeping the peace. That duty, as I have shown, had been performed on several occasions in faithful recognition of the terms of the treaty and our obligations under it.

Let us now see how these obligations, principles, and precedents square with the acts of the Administration toward Colombia and Panama, which acts finally culminated in recognizing the people engaged in the revolt in Panama and the territory implicated as an independent Republic.

Early this year the United States and the Republic of Colombia, through their duly accredited and authorized representatives, entered into an agreement and proposed a treaty known as the Hay-Herran treaty, by the terms of which a canal was to be built to join the two oceans at Panama. I need not now stop to consider the terms of that treaty, as it is immaterial for the purpose I now have in mind. The Senate of the United States confirmed that treaty, and Colombia refused to ratify it, and adjourned without ratifying it on October 31 last. No one claims that Colombia had not a perfect legal right to refuse to ratify the treaty, or that it is a strange or uncommon thing for one country or another to refuse to ratify a treaty, as we rejected the Johnson-Clarendon treaty, and later England rejected the Hay-Pauncefote treaty until it was amended.

We need not now stop to inquire whether it would not have been far better for Colombia and for us had she ratified the treaty and relied upon our fairness to recognize later on any just claims she might have for further and greater concessions. She claimed that the treaty was unsatisfactory in that the lease was not perpetual, but renewable at long intervals; also, that the canal zone was too narrow, so that a conflict of jurisdiction within the canal zone seemed inevitable; and also in some other vital particulars the treaty was not satisfactory, so she saw fit to reject the treaty, and her Congress dissolved October 31.

Ten days later the Congress of the United States was to convene in extraordinary session to pass upon the ratification of another treaty with Cuba. It was to be specially engaged in the treaty business. We had been waiting from early spring to see if Colombia would accept the treaty. Ten days longer wait would not have seemed an unwarranted delay to any but an impetuous and overstrenuous person.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. THAYER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I gather from the gentleman's remarks that he placed the rejection of the treaty by Colombia at some time in October.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman ought not to gather that from anything I have said. I have not said anything of that kind. I said that the Colombian Congress adjourned October 31. Away back in the August before that they had rejected the treaty, but they remained in session, and we, as legislators, know that at any time up to the date of their final adjournment, which was October 31, they could have reconsidered their rejection of the treaty and agreed to it, if they had so desired.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Was not a resolution introduced into the Colombian Congress looking to a renewal of the treaty or the making of a new treaty?

Mr. THAYER. There was. The matter was under discussion, and our representative there was communicating with the Government here, saying that probably the treaty with some amendments might be ratified. But our President is not the man to wait when there can be something a-doing. If this matter of having a canal at Panama was not settled before Congress convened ten days later, the friends of the Nicaragua route and the friends of other routes might be reenforced and make more trouble for the Panama route.

Personally the President was in favor of building the canal at Panama, and he was not unfriendly with the French canal company. He seemed anxious to impress upon the American people that they had a strenuous man at the helm who did not stop at trifles—one who would ride any kind of a broncho where others, more cautious, dare not tread. It was this impetuous and irresistible personality that he wished to impress upon the people. They were to realize that their Chief Executive was not only a man of word, but of action. If there was no precedent to sustain, he would establish one, and if there was no law he would make one. The present occupant of the White House was not to be trifled with, law or no law.

He tells us in his message of January 4 that prior to October 31 certain newspapers predicted the secession of Panama if Colombia did not accept the treaty. In his message he says:

> Everyone knew that it was possible, but it was not until toward the end of October that it appeared to be an imminent probability. Although the Administration, of course, had special means of knowledge, no such means were necessary in order to appreciate the possibility, and toward the end the likelihood, of such a revolutionary outbreak and of its success.

And to further show what was likely to occur he incorporates in his message a statement of the New York Herald of September 10, as follows:

> Representatives of strong interests in the Isthmus of Panama, who make their headquarters in this city, are considering a plan of action to be undertaken in cooperation with men of similar means in Panama and Colon to bring about a revolution and form an independent Government in Panama opposed to that of Bogota.

Bearing in mind that the Colombian Congress adjourned on October 31 without ratifying the treaty, and also that, so far as we can determine by the correspondence laid before Congress between Mr. Beaupré, member of our legation at Bogota, or any other of our representatives there, and any Department of our Government here, no intelligence or communication was had between October 31 and the following November 6 relative to any revolt by the people of Panama, yet the Administration of the United States sent to our forces at Panama this order on November 2:

> Prevent landing of any armed force with hostile intent, either Government or insurgent, at any point within 50 miles of Panama. Government forces reported approaching Panama in vessels. Prevent their landing if, in your judgment, the landing would precipitate a conflict.

And on the same day, November 2, the Navy Department gave the following order to the commander of the Nashville at Colon:

> Maintain free and uninterrupted transit. If interruption threatened by armed force, occupy the line of railroad. Prevent landing of armed force with hostile intent, either Government or insurgent, either at Colon, Porto Bello, or other points.

And the same orders were sent the Boston and the Dixie.

These orders, we should remember, were given to a force which had been gathered within the last few days near the Isthmus, and before any insurrection or revolt had occurred. Remember, this was upon the Monday following the Saturday when the Colombian Congress adjourned.

Note also the language:

> Government forces reported approaching the Isthmus in vessels.

Who reported this?

When, where, and to whom?

The correspondence furnished the Senate under a resolution asking for all the correspondence fails to show any such report from anyone, and there has not been till this blessed hour any official report or notice given to the American people stating the sources from which this report came.

Is it true that thus early the three traitors to the Colombian Republic—namely, Jose Agustin Arango, Federico Boyd, and Tomas Arias—had begun communicating with our Government here in Washington? These were the same three, with about twenty other influential men in Panama, who incited the people of Panama to revolt and urged immediate revolution and secession. These were the men who had been to New York consulting with the counsel and directors of the French canal company. These were the parties who were deeply interested that the canal should be built at Panama at once, at any cost, and at any hazard.

I do not charge that they made the report, for I do not know, and no one else can ever know from the correspondence submitted to the Senate relative to the unfortunate affair.

But we do know that the President gave the order referred to on November 2, twenty-four hours before there was any revolt whatever on the Isthmus, and probably the leaders of the secession movement knew of the order as soon as our representative there did.

It must have given great strength and comfort to the few plotting the revolt. One can easily see the effect which would be produced upon that ignorant and irresponsible people when their agitators and coconspirators could go among the people and truthfully declare that the United States had allied itself with them and by force, if necessary, would prevent a soldier or a marine coming into Panama or anywhere within 50 miles of the city to secure order, quell disturbance, and force the little band of insurgents to lay down their arms, if they had any, and submit to the law of the land; in short, break up and put an end to the insubordination and rebellion.

Could Colombia have put down the rebellion and restored order if we had permitted her to?

Colombia had a population of 5,000,000 people, Panama about 250,000. If we had "stood hands off," as we were in duty bound to do under the provisions of the treaty we had with Colombia, it is but natural to assume that Colombia would have put down the rebellion, restored order, and reestablished free transit across the Isthmus in a very brief time.

If perchance she found herself unable to do this, it was our duty, if we were to do anything, to assist her to maintain her sovereignty, and it was not our duty to prevent her doing this by intervention of our armed force.

Now, what, as a matter of fact, happened after the Administration had sent orders to our troops not to permit the Colombian troops to enter upon the Isthmus? Just what we might naturally expect would happen. There was a revolt the next day, November 3, by some of the people of Panama.

Colombian generals in command, with four or five hundred troops, went to Panama on November 3. Captain Hubbard, of the Nashville, allowed these troops to come, as, he says, he did not feel justified in preventing them, as the insurrection had not broken out.

On the next day, November 3, the Colombian generals wanted their troops sent across from Colon to Panama. This Captain Hubbard would not allow, and on the next day, November 4, ordered a force from the Nashville ashore and took possession of the railroad station, so the Colombian troops could not move. In a day or two more they were forced to leave the Isthmus. They stood not upon the order of their going, but went at once.

On November 5, two days after the first revolt occurred in Panama, the United States received from Panama a formal announcement, signed by the three persons to whom I have already referred, calling themselves a "junta," that "the Republic of Panama was established."

And on the very next day, November 6, four days before the American Congress was to convene, the Administration recognized the new Republic by the following dispatch to our minister at Bogota:

> The people of Panama have, by an apparently unanimous movement, dissolved their connection with the Republic of Colombia and resumed their independence, and having adopted a government of their own, republican in form, with the Government of the United States of America has entered into relations; the President of the United States, in accordance with the ties of friendship which have so long and so happily existed between the respective nations, most earnestly commends to the governments of Colombia and Panama the peaceful settlement of all questions at issue between them, etc.

How did this Government know that Panama had won or declared her independence? What did our Government know of the sentiments of the people of Panama in less than three days after the first revolt began?

In no other way than that the three self-elected persons calling themselves a "junta" had so reported. Had this "junta," or the people of Panama, any constitution, any officers, any legislature, any form of government? None whatever!

And yet they are recognized by the American Republic as an independent people "with a government republican in form."

What a commentary upon republics and republican form of government!

I am mindful of the fact that those who would try to bolster up the Administration in its conduct in this whole matter have claimed to justify the landing of troops by Captain Hubbard of the Nashville on the ground that it was necessary and done to protect the American citizens on the Isthmus from harm and danger by the Colombian troops. This is but a miserable excuse. Colombia's 400 troops had landed at Colon on their way across the Isthmus to Panama, there to quell this disturbance, and not at Colon, for there was no disturbance at Colon. Captain Hubbard landed his troops and gave orders that Colombia's troops should not be transferred across the Isthmus by rail. The troops of the two countries were there, face to face, near the depot. The Colombian troops did not and dared not attempt to take passage to Panama.

Can anyone doubt what Captain Hubbard and his troops were there at the railroad terminal for? Was he there to protect American citizens, women and children? Captain Hubbard was there in response to orders from our Navy Department "to occupy the line of railroad and prevent the landing of any armed force," and the further order from our State Department that "troops which landed from the Cartagena should not proceed to Panama."

Captain Hubbard, in reporting what took place at the railroad station in Colon, says:

> I am positive that the determined attitude of our men (American troops), their coolness and evident intention of standing their ground, had a salutary and decisive effect on the immediate situation and was the initial step in the ultimate abandonment of Colon by their troops (Colombia's).

It is a mere subterfuge to claim that we used our troops to protect American citizens at Colon or elsewhere. We did it, primarily and purposely, to prevent Colombia's troops from quelling the disturbance at Panama and forcing the insurrectionists to subjugation, restoring order and a free transit across the Isthmus, and the maintenance of Colombia's sovereignty over the Isthmus and the whole Colombian territory; and all this in the face of and against our solemn obligations incurred in our treaty with Colombia when we "positively and efficaciously" promised perfect neutrality of the Isthmus; and, further, that—

> If any one or more of the citizens of either party shall infringe any of the articles of this treaty, such citizens shall be held personally responsible for the same, and the harmony and good correspondence between the nations shall not be interrupted thereby.

The defenders of the President's conduct in this Panama matter have asserted, as if it were a fact, that the President has violated no law. A treaty is as binding on the people who are parties to it as any law. International law is mainly the recital of what nations have done under treaties, and the precedents established by the conduct of nations under varied circumstances.

I have attempted to show, and I believe I have succeeded, that in sending our troops to Panama before any revolution had begun, and that upon the very first day that it did begin, interposing our forces to prevent Colombia from putting down the rebellion, we violated the treaty and committed an unlawful act.

But even if I am in error in this matter, I can tell you, Mr. Chairman, what law the President did violate. He violated the great, supreme law of justice and righteousness.

What is the next step in this melancholy history?

On November 6 Arango, Boyd, and Arias, the self-organized and self-characterized "junta," sent to our Secretary of State one Señor Philippe Bunau-Varilla with this letter:

PANAMA, November 6, 1903.

SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington, D. C.:

The board of provincial government of the Republic of Panama have appointed Señor Philippe Bunau-Varilla envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary near your Government, with powers to conduct diplomatic and financial negotiations. Deign to receive him and heed him.

J. A. ARANGO.
TOMAS ARIAS.
FEDERICO BOYD.

The independence of the Republic of Panama was at once recognized.

On the 17th of November the commissioners for the said "junta" reached this country. The treaty was ready for them when they reached Washington. It was negotiated, signed, and sealed between lunch and dinner. The agony was over, the curtain falls, and the commissioners return to inform the "junta" of the success of their errand.

These are the undisputed facts in this unfortunate affair. They appear mainly by official documents and correspondence.

While I concede that the right and authority to recognize the independence of revolting people rests with the President, that right should not be abused. It is not a new or complicated rule, but one well recognized and universally observed among all nations. I will cite three instances in our own country where the rule was referred to.

John Quincy Adams, in dealing with the South American republics, said to President Monroe:

> There is a stage in such contests when recognition of independence may be granted without departure from the obligations of neutrality. It is the stage when independence is established as a matter of fact so as to leave the chances of the opposite party to recover their domains utterly desperate.

Charles Sumner, later on, in referring to the action of England in recognizing the Southern Confederacy as a belligerent, said:

> The conclusion is clear. To justify recognition it must appear beyond doubt that de facto the contest is finished and that de facto the new government is established secure within fixed limits. These are conditions precedent not to be avoided without open offense to a friendly power and open violation of that international law which is the guardian of the world's peace. Armed recognition is simply recognition by coercion. It is a belligerent act constituting war, and can be vindicated only as war. But an attempt under guise of recognition to coerce the dismemberment or partition of a country is in its nature offensive beyond ordinary war.

And last I will cite a no less worthy and respected authority than the late President McKinley. In his message of April 11, 1898, Mr. McKinley, seeking to justify his refusal to recognize the independence of Cuba—and here let me stop to say, Mr. Chairman, that in my judgment President McKinley did not need to make any excuse for his delay in recognizing the independence of Cuba. If Congress had been content to follow the President in his purpose at that time, rather than with each returning sun to prod, force, and hound him till he was finally obliged to depart from his own wise policy in the Cuban matter, we should be far better off to-day, Cuba just as well off, and the poor Filipinos not the source of trouble they are to-day and will ever continue to be, or at least until we "back out." Mr. McKinley said in that memorable message:

> There are evidences that the United States, in addition to the test imposed by public law as a condition of the recognition of independence by a neutral state (to wit: that the revolting state shall in fact constitute a body politic, having a government in substance as well as in name, possessed of the elements of stability and forming de facto, if left to itself, a state among nations, reasonably capable of discharging the duties of a state), has imposed for its guidance in dealing with cases like these the further condition that recognition of independent statehood is not one to a revolted dependency until the danger of its being subjugated by the parent state has entirely passed away.

How pertinent are these words and this statement of international law to the conditions which confronted the first successor of President McKinley. Who will say that on November 6 the Government of Panama was any such government as Mr. McKinley described, "that the danger of its being subjugated by Colombia had passed away," when Colombia had hardly learned that any insurrection had occurred?

No thoughtful, reasoning man, be he lawyer or layman, can, I think, stop short of the conclusion, unwilling as he may be to reach it, that the Administration in its conduct toward Colombia and Panama violated precedents, international law, and the plain duty and undisputed terms of the treaty with Colombia.

Mr. Chairman, international law has no meaning if it does not bind the strong nation in its dealings with the weak. International law and jurisprudence rests upon the principles of eternal justice. If its rules and principles can be set aside from motives of interest or ambition or to gratify revenge whenever for the moment a great people or its rulers desire, then there is no international law save the highwayman's plea that might makes right.

It should be the highest ambition of our great Republic to be a leader among the peoples of the earth in the scrupulous regard for the rights of the weak rather than in the reckless exercise of overwhelming power at their expense.

We want the canal, and we shall have it; but we do not want it to the detriment of our good name, which is above all price, and we would have had it without the possibility of criticism of our conduct in procuring it had impetuous haste waited upon calm judgment and conservative action.

But above all, Mr. Chairman, we wish our Government to be one of laws and not of men.

Mr. Chairman, let me conclude my remarks by inserting this brief selection taken from an editorial in a friendly paper in a friendly nation. I quote from the London Graphic in an editorial on this Panama subject:

> We regret that the President has allowed the fair name of his Administration to be smirched by a transaction so utterly at variance with the most elementary principles of public law and international morality. We can not conceive a more lamentable outrage on the public conscience of the civilized world.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] such time as he desires.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt, in the very brief moments that I shall occupy, to discuss in detail the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER]. There is nothing that I could say, and there is nothing he has said, but has been repeated a hundred times in this Capitol during the last three months. I have no disposition to refer disrespectfully to any branch of the Government; but if there ever was a subject worn threadbare, worn out, until it became odious to the ears and obnoxious to the nostrils of the American people, it has been this endless and infernal iteration of a lot of platitudes about the recognition of the Panama Republic. So I shall not try to say anything new about it.

I have this to say, however, that I have a lawyer's training and a lawyer's instinct about the question of the receiver of stolen goods, and I can not by any possibility disconnect the act of the acquirement of the Isthmus of Panama from the receipt of it afterwards and the enjoyment of it afterwards. By no ethics, by no logic, no argument that I can make can I disconnect the criminality of the one, if there is any, from the character of the other; and, therefore, when the gentleman says, "We want a canal and we are going to have it," he has admitted away all of his case, and stands indictable at the same bar, by the same grand jury, and upon the same evidence that he brings against the President.

Now, I want to say another thing. If the United States was guilty of a violation of international law, it was that violation and that alone that made any republic, or government, or combination, whatever it may be called, possible in the Isthmus of Panama. And so the original character of the conspiracy that the gentleman has described, if there was one, and the original character of the relation of our Government to the transaction, tainted the whole transaction, and no lapse of time, and no new conditions can by any possibility rechristen the child of that revolution by any higher or better name than the one given to it by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Therefore, while he condemns the United States in unmeasured terms of bitterness, and makes insinuations against the President of a character to which I do not wish to refer, I point out to the gentleman that the great nations of the world are also receivers of these stolen goods.

Bear in mind that my argument consists, in the first instance, of this: "Whatever there is of the Republic of Panama," says the gentleman, "was born of a conspiracy between somebody in the United States"—and by insinuation born within the knowledge at least of the President of the United States—"and a little irresponsible coterie down at Panama," all of which now is laid bare by the gentleman, and all of which is known by the whole civilized world; and yet, over the protest of Colombia, and yet with just as much information as the gentleman from Massachusetts has, and without any purpose of partisan advantage, England, France, Germany, Russia, Holland, Austria, Spain, Portugal, all the nations, all the great powers of the world, with every South American republic, have come in and indorsed the action of the United States Government by ratification, as it were, the recognition of this new Republic.

So when the gentleman, for partisan purposes, assails the President of the United States and assails the fair fame of his own country, he is assailing the intelligence and law-abiding character of the whole civilized world.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. THAYER. Is it not true, I ask the gentleman, that the other nations failed to recognize the Republic of Panama until at least a month in most instances after we had stood behind, protecting and guaranteeing Panama, and until Panama had, at least to some extent, become a de facto Republic?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The argument of the gentleman is that if you are committing a crime and defying the world and standing up to it and holding onto the proceeds one month, then the character of it is condoned, because you have been so persistent to hold on. That is the argument. That is where he is driven to. Does he think that the nations of the Old World, with their wonderful intelligence and great diplomatic wisdom and knowledge, have been carried by the action of the United States to condoning an act of criminal violation of international law? Our Democratic friends on the other side have not always, Mr. Chairman, been so careful of the rights of other countries as is manifested by the gentleman from Massachusetts in the particular occasion now under consideration. If he is right about it, if all these crimes have been committed, then history is repeating itself with a little appendix to the former chapter.

I remember, although only a boy at the time, that the whole country became greatly interested in the movement of the Democratic Administration, represented in Europe by Mr. Mason of Virginia, Mr. Soule of Louisiana, and Mr. Buchanan of Pennsylvania, ministers at London, Paris, and Madrid. They assembled at the town of Ostend, a beautiful watering place on the English Channel, in neutral Belgium, and they made a certain "manifesto," which passed into history, indorsed by the Democratic party, by the election of the chief mover in it to be President of the United States a year or two afterwards, and which was the Democratic policy at the time. The Ostend manifesto was a proposition to notify Spain, on behalf of the United States, that we would give $100,000,000 for the island of Cuba.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me finish my statement. That it had become a kind of political necessity that we should have Cuba as a part of our Government. Therefore Spain was notified that if she would accept $100,000,000 and quiet title to the property, if she was willing she could have that $100,000,000, and if not we would go to war and seize it. Now I will listen to the gentleman.

Mr. THAYER. And is it not true that the next Republican convention, in 1856, condemned that in the strongest terms? And is not the Administration now doing what you then put on record as being worthy of condemnation?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If we did, we did exactly right.

Mr. THAYER. You are now doing what you condemn the Democrats for doing. You said the Democrats were wrong, and state that the Republicans were exactly right in condemning it. Why do you not condemn the same thing now?

Mr. GROSVENOR. What thing?

Mr. THAYER. Our transactions with Panama.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is so much difference I do not recognize the analogy.

Mr. THAYER. Then why did you refer to it at all if the situations are not analogous? You referred to it for the purpose of showing that Democrats need not complain, as they then attempted to do just what I have shown that the Administration has now done.

Mr. GROSVENOR. To point the sins you have been committing in the days past [laughter on the Republican side], and I congratulate you on the fact that you have improved in political morals very greatly, and that your memories are so short that you do not remember the depth of iniquity out of which you have come. [Laughter on the Republican side.] That is all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, without going through over these things in detail, I will make a few suggestions. I believe that 99 out of every 100 people in the United States of America, except the Mugwumps of Massachusetts [laughter], are unqualifiedly and enthusiastically in approval of the course taken by the President of the United States in the matter of the Panama Canal. I believe that if he had not done just exactly what he did do, or if he had varied there in the Isthmus a feather's weight in the vindication of the majesty and duty and rights of the American people in that behalf, that side of the House and that side of the Senate would be resounding to-day with the abuse of the President as being unfit to represent a great nation upon a great question.

I believe that Theodore Roosevelt placed a star in the crown of his Administration brighter than it had been the good fortune of any American President in the last thirty years to have established. [Applause on the Republican side.] I believe it will go down to the latest generations of our country's history as an Administration of what one man or one Administration can do to redeem the character of the nation from the possibility of the charge of imbecility and lack of courage in an hour of extreme peril and excitement. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I believe that if the gentleman will put his ear to the ground just now and listen to the sounds that are coming from all over the United States, from the North and the West and the East, and even the South, he will hear a sound of indorsement of Theodore Roosevelt in this particular matter of the Panama question that will unsettle his views as to the future possibility of Democratic victory in the coming election for President. [Applause.]

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman refer me to any paper of any standing that justified the President of the United States in his course at recognizing Panama at the time he did and in the way he did?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If I was going to reach the end more directly, I would ask the gentleman to refer me to any paper which condemns it.

Mr. THAYER. I will refer the gentleman to the statement made by the professors of Yale College.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, my God! [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. Their opinion is worth a little something on international law. The gentleman can not laugh down the thing in that manner. These professors know about as much about international law as the gentleman from Ohio. It ill becomes him to state that in his opinion all the people are in favor of Mr. Roosevelt's proposition, and then when I call to his attention such men as these professors in Yale College simply shout "Mugwump," or can he make the proposition and then laugh into ridicule the opinions of these learned men. The professors of Yale College are entitled to some consideration, Mugwumps or no Mugwumps.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can state a thousand papers which are in favor of it. The New York Tribune——

Mr. THAYER. The New York Sun, did you say?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not. Yes, the New York Sun, also, and strangely enough, the New York Sun, while opposing President Roosevelt and condemning President Roosevelt in many respects, as I read it, thoroughly approved of his course in that particular.

Mr. THAYER. It does not, as anybody ought to read it. I do not know how you read it. You have such a noted faculty of reading things in papers that nobody else can find.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And now I am told the gentleman has not been quite in good faith in this matter of Yale College, and while some twenty professors there have condemned the President, Mugwump professors, fifty professors of Yale College strongly indorse the President's conduct and have signed a paper to that effect.

Mr. THAYER. Then, what are you ridiculing them for—Mugwumps? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not ridicule them.

Mr. THAYER. Another thing, I ask the gentlemen wherein have I showed any bad faith? I did not say all the men of Yale College; I said twenty or more, and——

Mr. GROSVENER. I have not yielded the floor to the gentleman, and I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. THAYER. I did not know——

Mr. GROSVENOR (continuing). And the gentleman gets excited and disturbs the peace, and I do not want that to happen. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman's peace of mind seems to be easily disturbed on this matter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I am quite aware that political action of gentlemen is not confined to the House of Representatives nor to the Senate. I am not oblivious of the fact that if the question was whether the Ten Commandments were absolutely a guide to good morals, I could find a good many college professors who would denounce them without any hesitation, or at least they would want to amend them and put in some later discovery of science. Now, I am not to be misled, I have but a very few moments, and I promised to occupy but a very few moments; I have pointed out what, in my judgment, will be the voice of the American people. For more than a hundred years we have been trying by every process of diplomacy and by every known acquirement of knowledge to build a canal, and the time has come when the country is acutely in favor of it, when the necessity for it is pressing much stronger upon the great agricultural region of the South than it is upon the North.

And when all the people looked forward and witnessed the great battle that was fought here with so much distinguished success and ability by the gentleman on my left [Mr. HEPBURN], chairman of the great committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in favor of the Nicaragua Canal, and finally, when that question seemed to turn the other way, all the people of the country said, "We are in favor of now going forward," and it ceased to be a party question, or had reduced itself down to the struggle of a few men. Then came the question. We accepted the proposition of Colombia, because that was in fact what took place. The treaty that was afterwards rejected was a treaty drawn in effect and agreed to absolutely by their own agent.

Then they came to a point where they undertook to jockey with us and force the payment of a larger sum of money. Believing that the President's position now is true, that when it had passed beyond the power of the President to negotiate for the Nicaragua Canal, actuated by the mere purpose of attempting to hold up the Government of the United States by seizing it by the throat and compelling the payment of ten million more dollars to them, and when that attempt came and the people of this country witnessed the uprising of Panama—that was the time when the patriotism of this country said, "We have settled the great question of the world by the genius of American diplomacy and the American courage of action."

Mr. HARDWICK. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio this question: Even if it is true that the diplomatic agents of the Republic of Colombia negotiated this treaty with the United States of America, would the fact that the Senate of Colombia afterwards, in the exercise of its functions, rejected the treaty be any cause of complaint against that Government?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It would depend wholly and entirely upon the circumstances under which it was done, and no matter how it was done, there is a power, and it is moving in the civilized world, a power greater than the little contemptible spirit of the Colombian Senate, a power that says that in the interest of civilization, in the interest of prosperity, in the interest of the millions of American people, in the interest of the millions of the people in the Orient, a canal shall be built; and woe to the politician or the newspaper man or the college professor that gets in the way of this mighty movement of a mighty people to do a mighty thing. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, I have in my hand a paper of at least fair repute——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. In a moment. I consider it a great and able newspaper. The Philadelphia Inquirer has an editorial to-day headed "Panama Canal obstructionists should be placarded from one end of the country to the other." I will, in order that the gentleman from Massachusetts may see that I have accepted his challenge, put it into my remarks:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, February 1, 1904.]

PANAMA CANAL OBSTRUCTIONISTS SHOULD BE PLACARDED FROM ONE END OF THE COUNTRY TO THE OTHER.

As long as there are Senators who are inclined to do so there can be obstruction to the ratification of the Panama Canal treaty.

But the time has come when the Republican majority should not longer submit to the miserable game of hold-up in a spirit of meekness.

The names of the obstructionists ought to be placarded from one end of the country to the other as foes of progress.

They ought to be smoked out—every one of them—in order that the American people may know just who the men are who are so shamefully and shamelessly misrepresenting public sentiment.

The whole story of the canal negotiations has been given to the people. There is no stain upon the hands of the Administration. The President has done exactly the right thing at the right time. Public censure does not fall upon him, but upon those Senators of the United States who have thought to gain some partisan end by opposing a measure that is of the utmost importance to the nation.

Let the friends of the treaty and of national progess force the fight and drive the obstructionists out of their hiding places and into the full glare of publicity.

The nation demands action, and it will know how to deal with those who are not with it in hurrying work upon the greatest of all world enterprises.

Mr. THAYER. I notice that the gentleman has by calling to my attention one single newspaper in this country.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say that 95 per cent of the newspapers are on that side, among them the Atlanta Constitution, one of the ablest papers in the South, a Charleston paper, two New Orleans papers, and all over the country. I know of no great, intelligent paper not steeped in partisanship that is not in favor of this canal that is to be built by the American people.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman be willing that I shall read a resolution in the Republican platform of 1856 for his information in relation to the Ostend manifesto?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; I cast my first vote in favor of that platform. I am held by it; I am in favor of it; splendid old platform! Never has been improved upon. Free speech, free press, free men, Fremont and anti-Democratic wherever they were. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. Yes; and they all went down together like the one-horse shay——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman has passed away from the point that I was about to question him upon.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to say to the gentleman that I have not indorsed the Ostend manifesto. I say it was an attempted piratical outrage.

Mr. THAYER. That was that we should take Cuba at a certain price; and if she would not agree to it, we were to take her whether or no?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is what it was.

Mr. THAYER. And that is what we did with Panama—if they would not accept our treaty we would take the right to build the canal, law or no law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Isn't the gentleman satisfied with his speech? [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. Perfectly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then why doesn't he put an end to it?

Mr. THAYER. I suppose the gentleman from Ohio would like everybody to put an end to his speech except his own, and he talks ten times more than any man on the floor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the gentleman ought not to take his own time and then break me up into pieces.

Mr. THAYER. Oh, there is not anything that will break the gentleman up in his talk except the judgment day. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, when the judgment day comes, and I am hunting around for an advocate to present my cause, let me say to the gentleman that I shall not spend my time looking in that section of the country for him. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. Oh, I shall be in a cooler place. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was practically through with my very able remarks when the gentleman injected himself in here to show that the Ostend manifesto——

Mr. THAYER. But the gentleman referred to it himself. I did not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. To show that the Ostend manifesto was condemned by the Republican party. I thought he had done it. He has forgotten it already. I thought he had done it. I thought he got that platform to read to us to show that the Republicans in 1856 condemned the Ostend manifesto.

Mr. THAYER. I hold it now in my hand, but you will not give me the time to read it. You prefer, as in many other things, to continue in your ignorance of it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I am right. I say that the gentleman came in here to show me that we had condemned that platform.

Mr. THAYER. And now the gentleman in sustaining the Administration is taking a position right the contrary to that. That is my position.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all. I have shown the gentleman as far as I could, in my feeble way, that there is not the slightest parallel between them, any more than there would be between the Mexican war on the one hand and the war of our Revolution on the other.

Mr. THAYER. I will say that the gentleman has entirely failed to convince me of it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will not the gentleman allow me to complete a sentence or two without putting his answer into it? I do not want to have it all broken up into patches.

Mr. THAYER. Oh, there is no danger of breaking the gentleman up. I can only expect to bend him a little.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not mine written out, and can not speak with the vim that the gentleman did. I am trying to speak from the inspiration of the moment, and the gentleman ought to take pity on me and give me a chance. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, a single word more. There are issues enough, my Democratic brethren, upon which you can go to war with the Republicans this coming campaign. I do not know what they all are, but I know there are several of them. You have enough of them, in my judgment, of sufficient strength to make a very respectable fight. The last two campaigns you have waged were not respectable in power. The defeats that you sustained were so great, so overwhelming, so expected by us and so unexpected by you, that the glory of two great campaigns was stripped away.

You are in a position now, if you will call off a few more leaders and get rid of them, to give us a whole lot of trouble in the coming summer and fall. We are glad of that. We do not want to kick and beat the air any more. Give us an enemy. You have been an enemy worthy of the steel of any political party on earth—grand in your principles, glorious in your devotion to party duty, and powerful when you come under a banner that you are not ashamed of. You have issues enough.

The tradition of your party is substantially the tradition of a free-trade party, and you can pick a whole lot of little criticisms of our career in office during all of these eight years—there is plenty of fuel to feed the flame of partisan excitement and interest; but do not go into this battle tied hand and foot to a proposition so distasteful to the American people as to strip you of fighting power.

Do not come to us with an indorsement of any man's speech, whether a Representative or a Senator, that undertakes to condemn the United States in its action in the matter of the Panama Canal. If you do, there will not be enough left of you in November to make a respectable funeral procession. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I know that some gentlemen who are a little bit inclined to be protectionists, a little bit inclined to be gold-standard men, are quite willing to get up some cry of imperialism or some cry about Panama and get a banner under which they can fight without being driven to support the attitude you are going to take upon the great political questions of the day; but do not follow those men. If you do, you will go to ruin again just as you have done heretofore. [Laughter.]

I say that the brightest star in the galaxy that to-day shines upon the pathway of the candidate of the Republican party is his course in the Panama Canal question. [Applause on the Republican side.] It was not unduly precipitate. It was intelligent, wise, and characteristic of the Administration, doubtless in some part advised and recommended by the distinguished Secretary of State, than whom we have had no better, more clear-headed Secretary of State within the memory of living man. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And the people of the United States are in favor of the men who did it. If you want to be wise, you must not drive the rank and file of the American people to vote for Roosevelt because of his action on the Panama Canal, and that is what you are likely to do. He will be nominated by acclamation, and among the strong arguments that we shall make in his favor will be two things: First, when you say he is overstrenuous, overactive, overimpetuous, we will ask you, "What has he done?" Name the thing now. Where was he overimpetuous? What public act of Roosevelt would you criticise to-day on the stump of the United States? What act has he done that the Republican party can not indorse in its convention and the people of the country can not indorse at the polls? [Applause on the Republican side.] What is it? There is not one such act.

He promised at Buffalo to execute the policy and principles adhered to by William McKinley. I challenge any man—not to get up and interrupt me now—but I challenge him to take time and come here and tell me and tell the American people what principle, what act, what policy of McKinley, Roosevelt has not executed. And when we go to the American people and say to them, "You must either vote for Roosevelt or you must condemn McKinley," and when you supplement all that by saying, in addition, "You must condemn the policy of the American nation in the eyes of the whole world because of the Panama question," you will find yourselves in a dilemma that I hope you will never get into. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I observe that the official correspondence between our representative on the Isthmus of Panama and the State Department here in Washington indicates that a knowledge of the revolution was possessed here before it was down there.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not care——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. What I want to ask the gentleman is this: Thinking that he might be able to throw some light on that question, I would like to know if he can give to this committee any information showing that the State Department derived its knowledge of the revolution from Panama first—I mean, whether there was any official correspondence sent to the State Department from Panama before this message was sent from the State Department to Panama advising that a revolution had occurred or was about to occur?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not get my information in that way. I got my information in July. I read it again in the London Times of the early days of September, that there was in motion an element in Colombia sure to result in revolution in Panama if that treaty was defeated, and I believed it, and I believe the gentleman now believes it; and whether the President of the United States heard of it first or not, I do not know. Where he got his information I do not know. But I will tell the gentleman from Kentucky one thing. Roosevelt may be impetuous and he may be strenuous, but he is honest, he is truthful, and he would not lie, even under the pressure of the Senate of the United States. [Applause.] Whatever he says about the matter I implicitly believe, and so do 10,000,000 voters of the American people, as they will show the gentleman in good time.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I wish to say that I have the utmost confidence in the President's integrity, and I have asked these questions simply to get information, if it were possible to elicit it from the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So much talk has been made about it—so much has been said about it that it is becoming tiresome. Every gentleman who can get an audience anywhere commences to read a great lot of telegrams and official reports. I have no doubt that the President, keenly alive to his duty, on the alert with an ability of alertness second to no man on earth, heard the reverberation of the forthcoming revolution at Panama long before it took shape in the formation of the provisional government.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I simply wanted to know what formed the basis of that first message, sent, I believe, by Assistant Secretary Loomis.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The long experience we had of the treachery of those South American fellows down there was a warning to the President to be on the alert and attend to business; and my friend from Kentucky would stand here to-day to condemn him if he had waited twenty-four hours and injury had come to our cause down there, because it is our cause as well as the cause of civilized nations.

Mr. SIMS. May I interrupt the gentleman with a question? I never did it before in my life.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I shall be delighted to hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. SIMS. I am afraid you might think I did not pay proper attention if I did not ask you a question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman need not give himself any concern on that.

Mr. SIMS. Now, seriously, I can understand how every Republican and every Democrat who believes the Administration has done nothing wrong should advocate the ratification of the treaty. I think that is consistent, and think they ought to; but I want to know how the man, Republican or Democrat, can reconcile his position when he gets up here and tells us that the course of the Administration was equivalent to a crime, but that he wants to ratify the treaty and thereby get the benefit of the fruits of the crime.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, that is the old cry. The gentleman has had a great deal of practice in the courts of the country, and if he has had an unfortunate tramp assigned to him by the order of the court to defend for the presence on his person of a stolen watch or something of that kind, the gentleman knows how he always says somebody else gave it to him and puts the responsibility over onto some one else. I can not answer the gentleman's question. I think every man must answer that question for himself. I think that every American who votes to build the Panama Canal, to appropriate the money, and who stands by the future action of the Government, is estopped by the record and by his own conduct in pais to say now that the act of the President was a crime against the international law of the world. That is what I think.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask this further question, as the gentleman is so candid: If the gentleman from Ohio himself believed that the conduct of the Administration was a crime, he himself would not vote to ratify the treaty, if he had an opportunity?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Most assuredly I would not. But I wish the gentleman would not put such a question, because it suggests the possibility of a suspicion that I might believe that the Administration as now constituted could commit one of those crimes, and I do not believe it.

Mr. SIMS. I do not mean that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the Republican party will settle this question, as it has settled all the other great questions that have come before it; and in the long run, sooner or later, the merchant marine and the navies of the United States will go triumphantly through the Panama Canal, and all the people of the country will say, "Hallelujah!" and Roosevelt's name will stand high up on the scroll of fame for his part in this magnificent international act. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a very carefully written and wholly nonpartisan discussion in regard to our foreign and interstate commerce. I ask to extend my remarks for that purpose. It was furnished by Hon. O. P. Austin, of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce.

Mr. THAYER. Not objecting at all, I wish to ask, Has it anything to do with this question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, yes; it shows the value of the canal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the line indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Address delivered before the Rochester (N. Y.) Chamber of Commerce, by O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor, Thursday, January 7.]

I consider myself greatly honored in being permitted to address you on this occasion, and especially so in view of the fact that I come representing in some sense the new Department of Commerce and Labor. Unfortunately the head of the Department, the Hon. George B. Cortelyou, was unable to accept the cordial invitation which your officers extended to him to be present and personally address you, and I can assure you that this fact was to him a matter of sincere regret.

Himself a native of this great State, attached to its people by tender ties and personal association and recognizing keenly the important relation of this State and this city to commerce and industry, he greatly desired to accept the invitation and have this opportunity to personally talk with you about this subject of mutual interest, the work of the new Department and its relation to the growing commerce of our country. But the exacting duties of his position rendered this impracticable.

To organize a new Department consisting of over 10,000 people, scattered throughout all parts of the country, to adjust the relations of bureaus and divisions new and old, not only to each other, but to the important interests which they and he as the head of the Department must consider, is a great task.

When we consider that our country has now an area equal to that of all Europe, that our population is over 80 millions, and the number under the American flag and under the care of the Government is more than 90 millions, that our exports are now greater than those of any other nation, and our internal commerce equal to the international commerce of the world, we may realize in some degree the importance of the duty which devolves upon the man who organizes and directs the work of a new Department of Commerce and Labor.

"Say to the people of Rochester," said he to me on leaving, "that I very much regret my inability to accept in person their invitation and to have the opportunity personally to talk with them about the work and ambitions of the new Department of Commerce and Labor, and it is only the pressure of my public duties here that leads me to ask them to excuse me on this occasion."

And while you are thus, by force of circumstances, deprived of his presence and of that which he might say if here, I want to quote to you just a few words from his first annual report, which will indicate the broad view which he takes of the prospective work of the Department of Commerce and Labor and of the subjects with which it must deal—the commerce and industries of the nations of the world. In that report he said:

"The Department was not established to control the energies of the people. By furnishing them with needed information, it can help intelligence and self-reliance to put forth efforts in trade with the best results. This will be one of its chief aims. Conditions exactly as they are found will be shown in a true and impartial light.

"Statements of fact and statistics issued by this Department will be nonpartisan, not only in the usual political sense of the word, but in the broader sense of the freedom from bias of preconceived theories or of predilections toward or against individuals, associations, or organizations. By carrying out this policy the various branches of the Department, acting as a single organization, can render far greater service to labor and to capital than could be had from independent offices specifically devoted to particular interests. * * *

"The Department deals with the great concerns in commercial and industrial life. To be of service to these interests it must have their hearty cooperation and support. It must be a Department of business. It must be progressive, but at the same time conservative. It must not deviate in its course from the pathway of justice, strict and impartial. It must be nonpartisan in the highest and broadest sense.

"It must recognize no distinction as between large and small interests, as between the affluent or powerful and the humblest citizen. If it attempts to occupy a field that properly belongs to private endeavor, it will inevitably fail to realize the high hopes of its present well-wishers. It must adhere rigidly to the lines marked out since the foundation of the Government for Federal agencies in executing the will of the people.

"If these general principles are made effective, if conservatism and impartiality, coupled with ever increasing efficiency, mark its administration, I can not but believe that this new Department will become a mighty influence for good in our commercial and industrial affairs."

DEPARTMENTS OF COMMERCE IN OTHER COUNTRIES.

The Government of the United States has been none too soon in the organization of a Department of Commerce and Labor. The great importance of international trade has attracted attention in all parts of the world, and the struggle for representation in the world's markets has become more and more intense with each year. Already many of the leading nations of the world have organized departments of commerce, with cabinet ministers to direct the work and to make and cause to be made such studies and investigations as may prove helpful to the producing, manufacturing, and commercial interests of their respective countries.

No less than twenty countries and colonies of the world now have departments which, under one title or another, devote their attention to commerce, and among these are nearly all the great commercial countries of Europe and of the commercial world, and while we are somewhat late in organizing a department which will give its exclusive attention to commerce and industry, we have a magnificent foundation upon which to build and an enormous interest to care for and develop.

And it is because of this fact, the magnitude of the task, and the interests involved, that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor has moved slowly, carefully, and conscientiously, preferring, as he says in his report, to "lay the foundation on broad lines and build thoroughly and conservatively for the future," rather than "to sacrifice the essentials of sound organization to a desire to make an early showing from ill-considered and ill-timed investigations."

DEVELOPMENT OF OUR COMMERCE.

And now, having said what seems proper on such an occasion regarding the work of the new Department, I want to say something about the commerce with which it is to deal, and the future which I believe awaits it. This is a subject which to you men of affairs—merchants, manufacturers, exporters, bankers, transporters—can not but be, it seems to me, of great interest. You occupy a central position between the producing sections of the West and South and the manufacturing and exporting sections of the North and East.

The raw materials of the farm and mine and forest from the South and West pass your doors in immense quantities daily, and not a little of them find their way into your factories, and the production of your factories with that of other sections farther East and North find their way into every part of the civilized world, and in constantly increasing quantities. It is not unreasonable, then, to believe that you will be interested in this question of the expansion, past, present, and prospective, of our production and commerce, and while it is a subject with which you are familiar, to which you are giving your constant attention and labors and your best thoughts, it has occurred to me that perhaps a review of what has been accomplished in the past and some suggestions of what this accomplishment means for the future might not be improper.

A MOVING PANORAMA OF THE WORLD'S COMMERCE.

The student of commercial statistics who has at his command the record of the production, consumption, manufacture, and exchange, not only of his own country, but of all countries, not only of a single article, but of all articles, not only for a single year, but for all years as far back as records are available, should be able to draw some general conclusions from them which would be of interest even to those engaged in one or another of the various industries which he so considers.

The columns of figures which appear dry and uninteresting to many are to him living pictures of conditions during a long term of years and over a wide area, a moving panorama of the world's progress or of the progress of any particular section into which he may desire to examine; and while statistics when presented in detail are tiresome and uninteresting, I trust that some great facts, stated in general terms, measured merely by round millions or billions, may not prove tiresome but rather a picture of progress which may interest you and give you new faith in our great country and new courage for the sharp contests which are before you in the invasion of the world's markets.

THE GREATNESS OF GREAT FIGURES.

Before beginning my discussion of a subject on which I must talk almost exclusively of millions and billions, I trust you will pardon me if I say a word about the relation of these two great measures of quantity and value. We are so accustomed in this great country of ours to talk of millions, and even billions, that I think we scarcely stop to consider what an enormous sum a billion is. I do not need to say, of course, to you men of business that a billion is a thousand millions, in our acceptance of the term. But do we, any of us, fully comprehend what a vast sum a billion is?

It is so easy when you write a million simply to add three more ciphers and make it a billion that I hardly think we fully realize the difference. Let us take a simple and familiar subject as a method of determining the comparative greatness of the two terms "millions" and "billions." We all know how rapidly an expert counter of coins will manipulate them. You can scarcely follow the motion of his fingers as he shifts the shining coins from one pile to another and counts them. The Treasury experts will count 4,000 silver dollars in an hour and keep it up all day long, but that is their limit.

Working eight hours a day, then, an expert counter of coins will count 32,000 silver dollars in a day; but how long will it take him at that rate to count a million dollars? Thirty-one days. Think of a man counting silver dollars hour after hour, day after day, as fast as he can count them, and yet finding that at the end of thirty-one working days he has only counted 1,000,000! But that is only the beginning of the measurement of great figures, for if this same man were to go on counting silver dollars at the same rate of speed for ten years, he would find that he had only counted 100,000,000 of them, and that to count a billion dollars would require one hundred and two years of steady work at the rate of eight hours per day during every working day of every one of the one hundred and two years.

So when I begin to talk to you of billions of dollars in the measurement of our commerce or that of the world, please remember that a billion is a thousand times as much as a million, and that even that expert who can count a million in thirty-one days must take a full century to count a billion. And when you realize this I think you will agree with me that the figures which measure our commercial progress are not merely wonderful; they are appalling.

Our best—indeed, our only—method of foretelling the future is by a study of the past. If we want to know what our country is likely to accomplish in supplying the great markets of the world, both at home and abroad, we must first see what it has done in that line in the past and compare that work with that accomplished by other nations which are to be our competitors in the world's markets.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE HOME MARKET.

Before beginning a study of the question with reference to the markets of other parts of the world, let me call your attention to the importance of our home market. This is a subject of which we hear much from time to time, especially during political campaigns; but it is one which must impress itself upon all who study the figures of the actual consumption of the prosperous population of this great country of ours, a country with 80 millions of busy people, a population now increasing at the rate of nearly 2 millions per annum.

Before stating the figures of the value of our internal commerce, however, I want to give you a standard of measurement, a great unit of value by which we may measure its importance and its growth. The international commerce of the world, the entire foreign commerce of all the nations and colonies of the world, so far as we can measure it, amounted in the year 1900 to about 20 billions of dollars. That is the total of imports and exports combined of all countries and colonies of sufficient importance to maintain any sort of a record of their commerce.

A third of a century ago, in the year 1870, the international commerce of the world was 11 billions, but the deve opment and use of steam and steel and electricity in transportation and commerce, by land and sea, during the wonderful period in which this generation has lived has brought it to 22 billions in the year 1903.

Here, then, we have a definite measure of value; the entire international commerce of the world in 1870 amounted to 11 billions of dollars and in 1903 to 22 billions. And with this standard of value—this immense measuring rod—I propose to measure the internal commerce of the United States.

To determine what the internal commerce of a country is is much more difficult than to measure its foreign commerce. In the foreign commerce there are certain gateways through which all merchandise entering and leaving the country must pass, and it can there be definitely measured by the customs officers of the country; but there are no gateways at which the internal commerce of the country, that which passes from hand to hand or city to city, can be measured.

Our best mode of measuring the internal commerce, then, is to take the value of the various great products at the farm and mine and forest and factory, as stated by the decennial census, and after allowing a proper addition for the cost of transportation to the first dealer who handles them, accept this general total as the value of the internal commerce of that year, allowing for only a single transaction in each article.

OUR INTERNAL COMMERCE EQUALS THE INTERNATIONAL COMMERCE OF THE WORLD.

Applying, then, this mode of measurement—a mode generally accepted among economists—I find that the internal commerce of the United States was in 1870 7 billions of dollars, and that in 1900 it was 20 billions. With this definite basis of 20 billions in 1900 and knowing what rapid development has occurred in all lines during that period, we may safely and conservatively put the internal commerce of the year 1903 at 22 billions of dollars—a sum which actually equaled the entire international commerce of the world in that year.

Think of it, men of Rochester; you producers and manufacturers and merchants and traders and bankers and transporters, think of it! The market of our own country, the home market, in which you can transport your goods from the door of the factory to the door of the consumer without breaking bulk a single time, is equal to the entire international commerce of the world.

Not only is this true that our home market is equal to that offered by the international commerce of the entire world, but it is evidently growing far more rapidly than international commerce, for, as I have said, the internal commerce of the United States has grown from 7 billions in 1870 to 22 billions in 1903, while the international commerce has grown from 11 billions in 1870 to 22 billions in 1903, or, in other words, while the international commerce of the world is now twice as great as in 1870, the internal commerce of the United States is now three times as great as in that year and equals the entire commerce between all nations.

CAUSES OF THE GROWTH OF OUR COMMERCE.

What has been the cause of this wonderful growth in our internal commerce in the thirty-three years, a period over which the memory of most of those here present easily extends? There have been, during that time, no additions to our area upon this continent; no material changes in general conditions other than those which any energetic people might make in any country blessed with conditions equally favorable. Yet in that period our internal commerce has trebled while the international commerce of the world was doubling, and our foreign commerce has also trebled while that of the world as a whole was only doubling.

First, we must consider the increase of population. The prosperity of this country, its free homes offered to a free people, its high wages, its varied climate and productions and occupations, its rapid growth in wealth and development of the comforts and conveniences of daily life, all these things have attracted the attention of the world, and there have come to us from other parts of the world since the beginning of the year 1870 no less than 15,000,000 people, people whom we usually designate as "immigrants."

They have become permanent residents of the country, and the census of the year 1900 showed more than 10,000,000 persons of foreign birth then residing in the United States, forming 13 per cent of our busy population; earnest, energetic workers, in most cases, and adding materially to the wealth and prosperity of the country. The result of this vast addition of people, coupled with the increase natural to a country of prosperity and plentiful employment for a new generation, has been that our population has more than doubled in the past thirty-three years, while that of the world as a whole has increased but 25 per cent.

The world's population in 1870 was about 1,300 millions and in 1903 about 1,600 millions, an increase of 25 per cent, speaking in round terms. The population of the United States was in 1870 38½ millions, and in 1903 80 millions, an increase of a little more than 100 per cent.

INCREASE IN PRODUCTION OF STAPLE ARTICLES.

This is the first cause, then, of the development of our prosperity as compared with that of other parts of the world—a rapid growth of industrious, energetic, intelligent population in a country with a large area waiting for development—an area which, for variety of climate, fertility of soil, and power of production in agriculture, in minerals, for manufacturing, and in natural facilities for transportation is unequaled in any part of the world.

Now, let us see some of the results: In 1870 our production of wheat was 235,000,000 bushels; in 1903 it was 637,000,000, or nearly three times as much, while the population had but little more than doubled. Of corn, our production in 1870 was 1,000,000,000 bushels; in 1903 it was 2,250,000,000. In 1870 our cotton production was about 3,000,000 bales; in 1903, practically 10,000,000 bales.

In 1870 our production of steel was less than 100,000 tons; in 1903, more than 15,000,000 tons; and our production of pig iron and steel is now greater than that of England and Germany combined, and about one-third that of the entire world. In 1870 our production of copper was but 13,000 tons; in 1903 it was 280,000 tons, and we now produce one-half of the copper in the world.

In 1870 our production of petroleum was 220,000,000 gallons, and in 1903 more than 3,000,000,000 gallons, the exportations of that year being nearly a billion gallons, or more than four times as much as the total production of 1870. The coal production of the country in 1870 was 32,000,000 tons; in 1902 it was 365,000,000 tons, or more than eight times as much as in 1870. The gold and silver production of 1870 was $66,000,000 in value; that of 1902, $156,000,000. The total value of products of agriculture in 1870 was less than $2,000,000,000; in 1900 nearly $4,000,000,000.

The value of the products of the mines in 1870 was but little more than $200,000,000; in 1900 it was over $1,000,000,000. The length of the railroads of the country, by which the product of the farm and mines and forests are assembled for manufacturing, was, in 1870, 53,000 miles; in 1903, 210,000 miles, or four times as great in 1903 as in 1870, and our railroads now form two-fifths of the entire railroad system of the world.

The result of this rapid development of material for manufacturing and facilities for its concentration has been an increase in the gross value of the manufactures of the country from a little more than $4,000,000,000 in 1870 to $13,000,000,000 in 1900. And remember that all these things, this doubling and trebling and quadrupling and quintupling of the products of our country, have occurred while population was but little more than doubling.

INCREASE IN CURRENCY, WEALTH, AND BANK DEPOSITS.

And now for some of the financial results so far as relates to our own people. The internal commerce, as I have already said, has increased from 7 billions in 1870 to 22 billions in 1903; foreign commerce, from 828 millions to 2,445 millions, and the exports alone, from 392 millions to 1,420 millions. With this increase in production and commerce has come increased wealth and financial accumulations. The total money in circulation in 1870 was 675 millions. In 1903 it was 2,466 millions, or nearly four times as much in 1903 as in 1870, while population was but little more than twice as much.

The result is that the money in circulation in 1903 is over $30 per capita, while in 1870 it was but $17.50 per capita. With this increase in money in circulation has come increased wealth per capita and increased bank deposits.

The total wealth of the country in 1870 was stated by the census at 30 billions of dollars; for 1900 it was estimated at 94 billions, and to-day it may safely be put at a round 100 billion dollars.

The average wealth per capita, according to these figures, would be, in 1870, $780 and in 1903 $1,250, an increase of 60 per cent in the average per capita wealth in 1903, as compared with 1870. The effect of this increase of money and wealth is seen in increased bank clearings and, what is much better, in increased bank deposits among all classes of our population.

The bank clearings of New York City grew from twenty-eight billions in 1870 to seventy-five billions in 1902, and the bank clearings of the whole country from fifty-two billions in 1887 (the earliest available figures) to one hundred and sixteen billions in 1902, having thus doubled in fifteen years. The total deposits in the various classes of banks in 1875, the earliest year for which we have data, were, in round terms, $2,000,000,000; in 1902 they were nine billions, having thus quadrupled in twenty-seven years.

GREAT INCREASE IN SAVINGS DEPOSITS.

But the most gratifying feature of this picture of banking and financial conditions in our country is the fact that deposits in savings banks—those institutions for the safe-keeping of the earnings of workingmen and widows and orphans and children of the country—have increased from $550,000,000 in 1870 to two thousand nine hundred and thirty-five millions, or almost $3,000,000,000, in 1903. What say you, business men, of the future of a country whose workingmen and working women and children have three thousand millions of dollars laid aside for a "rainy day," a sum so great that to count it in silver dollars would require the time of one expert for three hundred and six years, counting steadily during eight hours of every day except Sundays for the entire period.

OUR PROGRESS COMPARED WITH OTHER NATIONS.

And now that we have taken a hurried glance at the commercial and financial conditions at home and the growth which has characterized the period under consideration—the lifetime of a single generation—let us see how we have fared as compared with other nations. I have already shown you that we have trebled our internal commerce while the international commerce of the world was doubling, and that our foreign commerce has also trebled while that of the world was doubling.

But I want to say a word or two about our standing among nations as a producer and consumer and exporter of the surplus products and how our progress compares with that of the great nations which are considered, and justly so, prosperous and progressive. The three great nations of the world with which it is necessary to compare our rate of progress are England, France, and Germany. These three countries, combined with the United States, supply one-half the total international commerce of the world, and it is therefore unnecessary to consider the other countries in an attempt to determine what our commercial growth has been as compared with the other great nations of the world.

Taking still the year 1870 as a starting point, and comparing conditions in the four countries in 1870 with the latest available data, it may be said that the exports of France have increased 277 million dollars; those of the United Kingdom, 443 million; those of Germany, 607 million, and those of the United States, 1,028 million dollars; the increase of the United States being equal to that of Germany and the United Kingdom combined, and nearly equal to all of the three countries under consideration. Comparing the growth by percentage of increase, it may be said that the United Kingdom shows a gain of 45 per cent; France, 50 per cent; Germany, 110 per cent, and the United States, 260 per cent.

In 1870 the United States stood at the bottom of the list, her exports being less than those of any of the three nations named. In 1903 she stands at the head of the list, her exports being greater than those of any other of the countries under consideration. These figures, it is proper to say, relate to exports of domestic merchandise only and do not include the reexportation of foreign or colonial merchandise, which forms a considerable share of the total exports of the European countries in question, especially the United Kingdom.

PROSPECTS OF FURTHER GROWTH OF COMMERCE.

And now a few words about the prospects of a continuance of this marvelous growth, a growth in which we have outstripped all other nations. The question which we are all anxiously asking is, Will it continue? To this I think we may give an affirmative answer.

Man's wants, while they appear complicated and numerous, may be classified and arranged into a few simple groups, namely: Food, clothing, heat, light, and manufactures.

And, curiously, we are the world's greatest producer of the chief factors in all these great requirements, for food, breadstuffs, and meats are the principal requirement. We produce more wheat than any other nation; we furnish 40 per cent of the meat which enters into international commerce, and we produce three-fourths of the corn of the world and are steadily increasing the quantity distributed to the markets of the world. For clothing, cotton is by far the most important single raw material, and we produce three-fourths of the cotton of the world and turn one-third of it into cloth in our own mills.

For heat, the world's chief reliance is coal, and our coal area equals that of all Europe, and our production now exceeds that of any other country. For light, the world's chief reliance is now petroleum, and we produce more of that article for use in lighting than any other nation, and have sold more than 500 million dollars' worth of it to the foreign world during the past decade.

Manufactures is the last on the list of man's great requirements which I have mentioned, but in this, as in all others, the United States is the world's largest producer.

In 1860, according to an estimate made by that distinguished statistician, Mr. Mulhall, the rank of the world's leading manufacturing nations was United Kingdom, France, Germany, United States, the United States thus being at the bottom of the list. In 1896 the same statistician made another estimate, and the list stood as follows: The United States, the United Kingdom, Germany, France, with the United States at the head of the list as the world's greatest producer of manufactures. And the progress made in the United States since that date is such as to fully warrant the assertion that not only is this country the greatest manufacturer of the world, but that our manufactures now nearly or quite equal the value of those of the United Kingdom, France, and Germany combined.

So we may assume, it seems to me, that our power to supply our enormous home market is now as great as ever, and is not likely to diminish, at least in the near future. The fields are still fertile, the mines still furnish their supplies to meet the requirements of the factories, the railroads continue to expand, and the manufacturing industries are steadily increasing their output and their power of production.

OUR RELATION TO FOREIGN MARKETS.

The principal questions with which we are concerned are, then: (1) Are the producing countries likely to drive us out of the field, and (2) are the countries which are now taking our products of the farm or factory likely to exclude them by adverse legislation or hostile rulings?

To both of these questions I am inclined to return a negative reply.

On the first question, that of the rivalry of other nations, I call your attention to the fact that we produce three-fourths of the world's cotton and corn, which makes it improbable that rivals are likely to trouble us in either of these directions, unless a willful limitation of production or excessive prices through speculation forces other countries into development of new industries of this character. As to meats, there have been for the past twenty years continuous reports that our meats and cattle were being shut out of this country or that, but our exportation of meats and live animals for food, instead of decreasing in that time, have practically doubled in value.

In manufactures we have heard a good deal about the exclusion of our products, but our exportation of manufactures in 1903 was nearly three times as great in value as in 1893 and six times as great as in 1870. The only article about which we need seriously inquire as to rivalry of production, then, is wheat, and a recent investigation which I have made assures me that we need have no serious difficulty on that ground. I find that the United States produced only 13 per cent of the world's wheat crop in 1870 and 22 per cent of the world's wheat crop in 1902.

I also find in this investigation that while we supplied 38 per cent of the wheat entering the world's international markets in 1875 we supplied 49 per cent in 1902. I also find that the increase in the production of wheat in the United States during the decade ending with 1901 was actually greater than the increase shown by Russia, India, Argentina, Australia, and Canada combined during that same period.

The remaining question, then, regarding the prospective retention of our foreign markets is as to the possibility or probability that our products may be excluded by adverse legislation and our total exports thus reduced. And I can not believe that this is at all probable. I have already called your attention to the fact that despite all the talk which we have heard for twenty years about the exclusion of our meats and live animals from the various European countries the value of our exports of this class has practically doubled in the past twenty years.

But there are other reasons for believing that Europe will not exclude or desire to exclude our products. I have already said that we produce three-fourths of the corn and cotton of the world, and it is also true that we supply more than one-half of the wheat imported by European countries. The rejection of our cotton, corn, or wheat by these European countries would be to reduce their own supply of these necessary articles, and by such reduction in the available supply must increase the price of the quantity remaining. The world requires all of our cotton and corn and wheat, and even if some country or group of countries should reject them because they were grown in America those countries would have to purchase elsewhere, and we should find our market in the spot from which that supply was drawn.

WORLD'S DEMAND FOR AMERICAN MANUFACTURES.

Even in manufactures we need scarcely fear serious results in view of the fact that our exports of manufactures to Europe have doubled during the very time in which we have been hearing the threats of their rejection by the markets of that part of the world.

The fact is that our manufactures sell themselves in foreign markets. There has been far less effort expended by our manufacturers in making sales of our products in foreign markets than in the home market, where competition of factories and workmen of equal skill is sharp. In the markets of Europe our goods have found their way purely on their merits.

I do not like the word "invasion," which has been applied to the introduction of our manufactures in European countries. To my mind, the term implies a forcible and unnatural process in the introduction of goods, which, in fact, are only sent to those markets because the markets themselves and the people who rely upon those markets demand our merchandise.

As I have already said, the sale of American manufactures in the markets of Europe is accomplished with far less "drumming" than is utilized in the sale of equal quantities in our home markets. And yet we send to Europe 200 million dollars' worth of manufactures every year—one-half of our total exportation of manufactures—and practically all of them upon orders originating with the merchants and consumers of those countries.

OUR SHARE IN THE MARKETS OF THE WORLD.

And now, just a word about the direction in which our exports are sent and the possibilities of their development.

Europe, which is by far the largest consumer of foreign goods, imports about 8 billion dollars' worth of merchandise annually, and of this we supply about 10 per cent; Africa about 500 million dollars' worth, of which we supply about 6 per cent; South America nearly 400 million dollars' worth, of which we supply about 10 per cent, while the countries of North America other than the United States import about 400 million dollars' worth, of which, by reason of our proximity and facilities for direct transportation to those countries, we supply about40 per cent.

While a considerable share of the international commerce of many of the countries is drawn from contiguous countries, we may safely assume that in view of the fact that we only supply from 5 to 15 per cent of the total imports of the countries other than those contiguous to us, that there are still in all of those countries opportunities awaiting the American producer and manufacturer, and I feel sure that we shall continue to enlarge our sales to each of the great divisions of the world.

Europe is constantly requiring more of our raw materials and foodstuffs, and she has a decided liking for our manufactures. Africa is developing new markets, and our exports to that continent are increasing rapidly. In South America and the Orient are awaiting vast opportunities for our commerce. From each of those parts of the world we now buy more than we sell to them. Our imports from South America are nearly three times as great as our exports to that continent, and from Asia and Oceania our imports are twice as great as our exports to those sections of the world.

SPECIAL ATTENTION REQUIRED IN SOUTH AMERICA AND THE ORIENT.

To every other part of the world except South America, Asia, and Oceania our exports far exceed our imports, but to those divisions we sell, as I have already indicated, much less than we buy from them. Our ambition, then, should be, it seems to me, to so cultivate those markets, whose importations are nearly $2,000,000,000 every year, that we may obtain our proper share of those markets, and make our sales to them an offset to our purchases of their products. Two great factors are essential to this result—direct steamship lines and an isthmian canal.

We should have from our various ports direct and plentiful steamship lines to the great centers of South America and Asia, as we already have to other parts of the world; and we should have from our great eastern and southern ports the direct communication with western South America and all of the Orient which an isthmian canal will give us. The steamships, I feel sure, will be provided by the calm, business judgment of our business men and statesmen.

The canal, which the whole country and the whole world have for years demanded, is now almost an assured fact, and I trust and believe that before the termination of the year upon which we are now entering the Government of our country will be actively engaged in the completion of a canal at that point which nature seems to have suggested and which is now favored by a large majority of those familiar with the subject—the Isthmus of Panama.

A SHIP CANAL FROM THE ATLANTIC TO THE LAKES.

And now just one word more. I have spoken of an isthmian canal and of the value which on completion it will prove to our commerce. But there is one other great improvement, one other great canal, which I hope to see our Government undertake, and that, too, as the very next step after the completion of the one upon the Isthmus.

And that is a ship canal which shall connect the Great Lakes of the United States with the Atlantic Ocean, a canal through which vessels which now sail the Atlantic will move steadily westward past your very doors, making the city of Rochester a seaport city, passing on into the Great Lakes and landing at Buffalo and Cleveland and Detroit and Duluth and Chicago, and thus making that most productive section of the world a great ocean frontage.

And then, on motion of Mr. HITT, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11287, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 1597. An act granting a pension to Rosa D. Mayhew—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 3130. An act granting an increase of pension to Nathan P. Bowman—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3274. An act granting an increase of pension to Jane I. Long—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3373. An act granting a pension to Eliza Williams—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3400. An act to amend the act entitled "An act granting a pension to Flora Stanton Kalk," approved February 25, 1899—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 3408. An act granting a pension to Lizzie Breen—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 133. An act granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth B. Sarson—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 3479. An act making provision for conveying in fee certain public grounds in the city of St. Augustine, Fla., for school purposes—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. R. 34. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point Alfonso Zelaya, of Nicaragua—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORT OF THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs:

To the Senate and the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, a letter from the Secretary of War, dated January 28, 1904, accompanied by the annual report of the Philippine Commission, dated December 23, 1903, and the appendixes thereto, submitted in compliance with the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippines, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902, and the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1903.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, February 1, 1904.

BURNETTA B. LEHMANN.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. RIXEY, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Burnetta B. Lehmann, Fifty-seventh Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BOWERSOCK, indefinitely, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

And then, on motion of Mr. HITT (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to an inquiry of the House, a statement of the number of horses and vehicles maintained by his Department—to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the vice-president of the Brightwood Railway Company, transmitting the report for the year ended December 31, 1903—to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BROWN of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10869) to apply a portion of the proceeds of the sales of public lands to the endowment of schools or departments of mines and mining in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," and for similar purposes, being a further supplement to said act, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 666); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10741) for the relief of Mrs. Mary Tate, of De Soto County, Miss., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 647); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDERHEAD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10682) granting an increase of pension to Marion Arnold, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 648); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SNOOK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10580) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Longberry, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 649); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10068) granting a pension to James G. Soims, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 650); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOLLIDAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9988) granting an increase of pension to William Ellis, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 651); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9921) granting a pension to Virginia Boyd, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 652); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. FULLER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9790) granting a pension to Ada L. Carpenter, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 653); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SULLOWAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 191) granting an increase of pension to Francis Roy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 654); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDERHEAD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9710) granting an increase of pension to Henry Frazier, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 655); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SNOOK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4631) granting an increase of pension to Julius Kraig, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 656); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5749) granting a pension to James B. Combs, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 657); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOLLIDAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3011) granting an increase of pension to Philip Duttenhauer, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 658); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. FULLER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 807) granting an increase of pension to William F. Benefiel, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 659); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SULLOWAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8863) granting an increase of pension to Edward O'Malley, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 660); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7221) granting an increase of pension to John Ryan, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 661); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6977) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Graves, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 662); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. LINDSAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4910) granting a pension to Prudentia L. D. Nugent, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 663); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7311) granting a pension to Thomas Large, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 664); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDERHEAD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7410) granting an increase of pension to Enos D. Hoge, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 665); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of bills of the following titles; which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4796) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. Allen—Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 7612) for the relief of the estate of Brig. Gen. Wager Swayne, in charge of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands—Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 9992) for the relief of B. L. Davis—Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GILLETT of California: A bill (H. R. 11512) to amend section 1 of an act approved August 13, 1888, entitled "An act to correct the enrollment of an act approved March 3, 1887, entitled 'An act to amend sections 1, 2, 3, and 10 of an act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from the State courts, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1875'"—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McDERMOTT: A bill (H. R. 11513) to authorize the appointment of boards of investigation and arbitration, and to define their powers and duties—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. HOLLIDAY: A bill (H. R. 11514) providing for an appropriation for the purpose of purchasing a site and erecting a public building thereon at the city of Greencastle, State of Indiana—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HEARST: A bill (H. R. 11515) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CALDWELL: A bill (H. R. 11516) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Carlinville, in the State of Illinois—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CRUMPACKER: A bill (H. R. 11517) providing for the payment of a portion of the expense of a census taken by any State or Territory in the year which is the mean between the decennial censuses of the United States—to the Committee on the Census.

By Mr. SLEMP: A bill (H. R. 11518) to authorize the holding of a regular term of the district court of the United States for the western district of Virginia in the city of Bigstone Gap, Va.—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: A bill (H. R. 11519) establishing a United States court and recording district at Duncan, Ind. T., and conforming other district therewith—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. NORRIS: A bill (H. R. 11520) providing for an additional homestead entry under certain conditions—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: A bill (H. R. 11521) to pay clerks and deputy clerks in the Indian Territory the deficit in their salaries—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. SCOTT: A bill (H. R. 11522) granting pensions to officers and enlisted men of the Eighteenth Battalion and Nineteenth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry who served thirty days or more in the Sioux Indian war in 1867, 1868, and 1869, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TAYLOR: A bill (H. R. 11523) authorizing the establishment and organization of a corps of dentists in the United States Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. MAYNARD: A concurrent resolution (H. C. Res. 39) directing the Secretary of War to cause an examination and survey to be made of the channel from deep water in Hampton Roads to the Norfolk Navy-Yard—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. SPARKMAN: A concurrent resolution (H. C. Res. 40) directing the Secretary of War to cause a survey to be made of the west channel of Tampa Bay, in Florida, thence of the west channel of Tampa Bay leading from the town of St. Petersburg to the northwest passage of Egmont Key—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

PRAYERS.

The Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD EVERETT HALE, said:

The Lord thy God is one God, and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy might. Let us pray.

Rabbi DAVID PHILIPSON, of Cincinnati, Ohio, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Father of us all, in the presence of the manifestations of Thy supreme greatness we humbly bow the head and exclaim, "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of Hosts; full is the whole earth of His glory."

We thank Thee for every noble thought that has been thought, for every unselfish deed that has been performed, for every inspiring word that has been spoken among men. We thank Thee above all for this dear fatherland of ours, the promised land of these latter days, the new Canaan, where modern prophets have preached truths no less inspiring than those spoken by Thy chosen messengers of old, where ideals have been set that point to the era of universal brotherhood and peace, the hope of all the great spirits of the race. To these ideals may we all remain true. May those who guide the helm of our ship of state be constantly mindful of the high mission of this American people among the nations of the earth to stand as the exemplar of justice, the protector of the weak, the foe of all unrighteousness, the scorner of all wrongdoing, the lover of peace. So imbue all with these ideals that our dear land may stand to the very end as the refuge of all those oppressed elsewhere, the sanctuary of liberty, the haven of peace.

May Thy blessing rest upon this place, this holy place of the liberties of our people. May Thy blessings rest upon the President, his counselors and advisers; upon all those intrusted with the guardianship of our rights and liberties. May peace and good will obtain among all the inhabitants of our land. May religion spread blessings among us and exalt our people in righteousness, that from one end of this great land to the other there may sound the glorious refrain, Praised be the Lord God from everlasting to everlasting. Amen.

The Chaplain recited the Lord's Prayer, as follows:

Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on the request of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will stand approved.

BRIG WILLIAM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the findings by the court relating to the vessel brig William, Joseph Thompson, master; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TESTS OF SUBMARINE BOATS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, stating, in response to a resolution of the 13th ultimo, that certain information asked for relative to the nonacceptable tests of submarine boats in the year 1903 should not be disclosed, as such information would be incompatible with the Government interests; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LAND-ENTRY CASES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 18th ultimo, a copy of a report by the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office in the case of Calvin A. Stanfield. What does the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] desire to have done with the communication?

Mr. PETTUS. I am inclined to the opinion that it ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. It concerns public lands, but it is merely a law question. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PAWNEE INDIAN SCHOOL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 27th ultimo, the original charges, reports, and other documents on file in the Interior Department relating to the superintendent and employees of the Pawnee Indian School, Oklahoma; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask that Senate resolution 82 be laid before the Senate, in order that I may submit a few remarks.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope that the Senator will not interfere with the regular order, which is the bringing over from a previous day of the resolutions on the table.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have no disposition to interfere with any Senator's convenience, and if it suits the Senator from South Carolina not to yield to me specially at this time, I will make my remarks as soon as I can get a hearing.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator wishes to make a speech, of course I want to hear him; but still the resolution which comes over from yesterday is an important matter, and I think we can dispose of it in a little while. I should like to call it up.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am informed that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] gave notice that he would speak this morning. I was not aware of that. I will adapt my convenience to that of other Senators. I only want to be heard when no one else desires to take the floor.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will not consume much of the time of the Senate in what I have to say, and if it is entirely agreeable to the Senator I will proceed in accordance with my notice of last night.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If not, I will yield to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will allow the morning business to be completed. It is not yet completed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. DRYDEN submitted an amendment providing for a secretary to the legation at Copenhagen, Denmark, at $2,000 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCOMAS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,396.28 to pay the Chesapeake Bank, of Baltimore, Md., the amount found to be due said bank by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under the act of Congress approved February 28, 1901, for internal-revenue taxes illegally collected, intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus claims bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the consul at Ciudad Porfirio Diaz, Mexico, from $2,000 to $3,000 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,758.45 to pay Julius A. Kaiser the amount disallowed by the accounting officers for difference between active duty pay of a second assistant engineer and retired pay of a first assistant engineer from October 13, 1868, to July 8, 1873, while on the active list of officers of the Navy, intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CULBERSON. I submit an amendment, intended to be proposed by me, to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and ask that it may be read and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the amendment was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CULBERSON to H. R. 10954, making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Add on page 13, after the word "States," the following:

"Provided, That range cattle and halter-broke cattle from all sections of the United States, whether above or below the quarantine line established by the Secretary of Agriculture, may be exhibited at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture."

RECESS APPOINTMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 114, by Mr. TILLMAN, instructing the Secretary of the Treasury to send to the Senate information in regard to the appointment of William D. Crum as collector at the port of Charleston, S. C.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I will be very glad indeed to have some action by the Senate on this resolution, but in view of the fact that the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Arkansas are here with prepared speeches and had not anticipated, I suppose, any interference with their convenience, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to this extent, that we will let those two gentlemen get through, and then if I may be allowed I will try to call up the resolution and have some action on it. It will be out of order then, but it can be done by unanimous consent. Of course, it takes unanimous consent now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table for the present, then, without prejudice.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 79) for the transportation of Porto Rican teachers to the United States and return.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 98) to provide for the removal of snow and ice from the streets, cross walks, and gutters of the District of Columbia; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

RELATIONS WITH COLOMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate, at the request of the Senator from Indiana, the unfinished business.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 82, by Mr. BACON, favoring the negotiation by the President of a treaty with the Republic of Colombia to satisfactorily adjust and determine all differences between the United States and Colombia growing out of the recent revolution in Panama, etc.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, yesterday I listened to the speech of the honorable and distinguished senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] with much interest. There are some portions of it to which I would like to direct attention, but I think, under the rule of the Senate, treaties should be considered in executive session.

Mr. CULLOM. Especially as that is the rule.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That is, as I understand it, the well-established rule. Therefore, what I may desire to say in response to the remarks of the Senator from Alabama will be said when the Senate takes up the treaty in executive session.

I believe in the wisdom of the rule which requires the consideration of treaties with other countries in executive session, and so far as I am concerned I will not intentionally violate that wise rule of the Senate, which has the sanction of long usage.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to consider particularly at the present time the resolution before the Senate, but rather to discuss the larger questions arising out of recent events in Colombia. I may say, however, that I earnestly favor the arbitration of all proper international differences which can not be adjusted through the usual diplomatic channels. Political questions are not such as governments refer to the determination of arbitral tribunals. The Secretary of State notified the special envoy from the Colombian Government that the good offices of the Government of the United States would be used with Panama, if desired, to secure an adjustment of claims of a material order which either may bring forward against the other, but he pointedly declined to submit to arbitration the alleged questions between the United States and Colombia. His refusal was distinctly put upon the ground that such questions are essentially political, and therefore not within that class of questions which self-respecting governments can properly submit to arbitration.

Mr. President, the questions growing out of affairs in Panama are important and deserve earnest consideration. The opposition sharply challenges the wisdom of the course of the Administration in dealing with the Republic of Colombia and the new Republic of Panama. Many phases of the Isthmian Canal question have been touched upon in the course of the debate; a debate which has been characterized by much earnestness and some manifestation of feeling.

We do not object because those who may disagree with us upon public measures or policies should criticise, for criticism plays a very important and beneficent purpose in public affairs. Measures and policies which can not successfully withstand opposition and criticism should not long receive our serious attention. There must be the utmost latitude of disagreement in republican government, for, out of the conflict of opinion, out of the collision of views, the most wholesome results will come.

We are well aware that in popular government objection and criticism are sometimes inspired by the thought of mere partisan advantage. We do not object to even this manner of opposition. It has been indulged in from the foundation of the Government, and will continue throughout the future. It seems to me in the progress of the debate that some of the criticism has been inspired by the exigencies of the political situation. I do not mean to suggest by this that some of the questions have not been raised in the utmost good faith, with the view of promoting in the best manner possible the construction of an Isthmian canal under conditions in entire harmony with the good name and best interests of the United States.

The larger question which is before us is of unusual moment; it is of far-reaching significance; it means much, not only for the future of the United States but for the entire civilized world. It should be considered upon the high level of national duty and national honor. It should be considered deliberately and in good temper, to the end that only that which is best may ultimately be done.

We are dealing with a situation, the essential facts of which are generally known. For centuries attention has been directed to securing a waterway across the Isthmus of Panama. The efforts which individuals, corporations, and governments have ineffectually made to accomplish the world-wide desire are familiar to us. Although the attempts thus far made have resulted in failure, we derive some advantage therefrom, for we may avoid the mistakes made by others.

In all the centuries the most significant and decisive step was taken by the Congress of the United States less than two years ago when it enacted into law the bill presented by the very able and distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. When that bill was enacted into law and placed upon the statute books it became evident to the world that the great work would be speedily carried forward to completion, for it was to be undertaken by the Government of the United States.

As all are well aware, the act authorized the President to secure the property of the New Panama Canal Company and to obtain the requisite concessions from Colombia for a canal across the Isthmus. The act wisely provided that in the event the President should "be unable to obtain for the United States a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company and the control of the necessary territory of the Republic of Colombia, * * * within a reasonable time and upon reasonable terms, then the President" should proceed with the canal upon the Nicaragua route.

The act very properly did not undertake to put upon him any specific limit as to time. What should be a "reasonable time" must, in the very nature of the case, be left largely to his discretion. Being thus clothed with the authority of law, the President proceeded with the utmost dispatch to negotiate a treaty with Colombia for the necessary property, rights and franchises for the construction and maintenance of the Panama Canal. He also agreed with the New Panama Canal Company upon terms for the purchase of its property which were to be effective when the requisite concessions were obtained from Colombia.

The treaty with Colombia, known as the Hay-Herran treaty, was laid before the Senate for its ratification. It provoked earnest and protracted debate. It was sharply opposed by those who favored the Nicaragua route. It was as severely antagonized as has been the course of the Administration with respect to the recognition of the Republic of Panama. In due time the treaty was ratified and transmitted to the Colombian Government for its approval. The action of that Government was awaited with interest. The world looked on with great solicitude, for Colombia had but to give her approval of the proposed convention negotiated by her minister at Washington and upon her own initiative, and the great work would proceed. Her disapproval would put the enterprise in peril or delay it indefinitely. But the concern of the United States and other countries was but slight when compared with the anxiety of Panama. The treaty which was approved by the Senate of the United States March 17, 1903, was laid before the Colombian Congress which assembled June 20 following.

Opposition to its ratification manifested itself early. Political parties undertook to make capital out of it. Our minister at Bogota informed the State Department before the close of the month in which we ratified it that there was strong opposition to its ratification. The public mind was agitated and misdirected by a portion of the public press and by politicians opposed to the Marroquin administration.

As early as May 4, 1903, our minister informed the Secretary of State that—

> Private discussion, which perhaps more clearly reflects the real situation, is to the effect that the price is inadequate; that a much greater sum of money can be obtained, and that the United States can be obligated to guarantee the sovereignty of Colombia ports outside the Department of Panama against the invasion or seizure by foreign enemies. The one great determining point, however, is the belief that the price can be greatly augmented.

Three days later he wrote:

> All of the enemies of the Government are united in the onslaught upon the canal convention. * * * Probabilities are that when the measure is presented to Congress there will be a lengthy debate and an adverse vote. Then the representatives of the coast departments of the Cauca, Panama, and Bolivar will ask for a reconsideration and urge ratification of the convention as the only means of preventing the secession of those departments and the attempt to constitute of their territories an independent Republic.

This dispatch clearly shows that early in the consideration of the proposed convention the spirit of revolution was in the air.

The varying fortunes of the treaty are disclosed by the dispatches of our minister, a few of which I have selected from the many he sent.

On August 5, 1903, he advised the State Department that—

> It is now apparent that the treaty will not be ratified without amendment.

On August 7 he reported:

> The situation is chaotic just now and intense feeling is being manifested in the debates in the Senate. Apparently there is little prospect that the treaty will be ratified without modifications, but I must still hope that a better sentiment will be brought about before the end.

On August 12, 1903, he said:

> The treaty was rejected by the Senate to-day in its entirety. Confidential. Do not accept this as final. There is still some hope. Wait for further advices.

On August 15 he became somewhat optimistic when he reported:

> The most intensely critical period for the canal treaty seems to have passed, and now there is some hope for a satisfactory conclusion.

But on October 31 following he was obliged to report:

> Congress adjourned to-day. No action has been taken upon the last report concerning the canal. Therefore, nothing more than the vote of August 12 rejecting treaty done.

It was perfectly obvious from the earliest consideration of the treaty that a determined effort would be made, not only to place the United States under further contribution, but the canal company also. Numerous suggestions were made from time to time as to the new demands to be made upon them. On September 5, Mr. Hay was informed that—

> The committee have reported a law which approves rejection of the treaty authorizes the President to conclude treaties for Panama canal or contract for same with private parties, subject to rights of companies; railroad company permitted to transfer, purchaser assuming all obligations, including annual payments of $250,000 and transfer of property to Colombia in 1967; canal company permitted to transfer on payment to Colombia of $10,000,000; the President authorized to make following concessions: Lease of zone for one hundred years, not including Panama or Colon; annual rent $150,000 until 1967; lease renewing every hundred years on payment of 25 per cent increase; neutrality of canal and the recognition of Colombian sovereignty over the whole territory and inhabitants; mixed tribunals only; police and sanitary commissions Colombian only; excluded from zone; time limit for completion of works; Colombia to receive from contracting government $20,000,000 on the ratification of the treaty; fixing regulations concerning purchase of private company.

This will suffice to show the exaggerated idea of the Government at Bogota as to the value of the proposed concession and the real motive of opposition to the approval of the proposed convention.

At a later date it was manifest that there was a movement contemplated to annul the concessions made by Colombia to the Panama Canal Company, to confiscate the property of the company under the law, and sell it to the United States, to the great injury of the French stockholders and owners. Our minister advised the State Department on the 30th of September—

> It is said, and generally believed in this city, that there is a project on foot among certain Senators to annul the arrangement entered into by the Colombian Government and the French Canal Company in 1900, extending the franchises and privileges of that company. Even men good enough to be candidates for President are advocating this action with all seriousness and solemnity. It is urged that Congress has full power to either annul or ratify the action of the Government in this matter, and that if the arrangement made extending the contract is decreed null and void, the French company's rights and interests in the Isthmus cease to exist, and Colombia could then arrange with the United States to receive not only the $10,000,000 offered her, but the $40,000,000 offered the company.

This is important only as showing the total lack of appreciation at Bogota of the rights of Panama. It all tended to inflame the minds of the people of that Department and stir within them the spirit of resentment and revolution.

Panama saw in the machinations at Bogota the possible ruin of her long-deferred hope. The Government might force the United States under the alternative provision of the Spooner law to adopt the Nicaragua route and leave the Panama enterprise to die. The wrongs and outrages which Panama had so long endured had destroyed all love for the Republic. The dearest rights of her people were cruelly trampled upon. Her history during most of the time since 1821 when she became a part of the Republic of Colombia is but a monotonous recital of acts of oppression and injustice committed by the national authority. While existing as a department of a nominal Republic, she has been but a province of a brutal dictatorship; she has been made virtually the spoil of the Government at Bogota.

Millions of dollars have been wrung from her people first and last, and they have received no adequate return therefor. Monopolies in the necessities of life have been granted, and the revenue derived therefrom has gone to Bogota. Millions of dollars received from the canal and railroad companies for concessions and franchises in Panama have gone into the federal treasury, and only the most insignificant fraction of it has ever been used for the benefit of that department.

For the millions contributed to the Bogota treasury, according to a trustworthy newspaper correspondent recently writing from the Isthmus, there is "not in existence in the whole of Panama today a single bridge, street, plaza, public building, or other structure of public utility or comfort, the expense of which was borne by the Colombian Government."

From information I have derived personally from citizens of Panama, it is perfectly apparent that the conditions upon the Isthmus have long been absolutely intolerable, and revolution has seemed to be the only means of escape.

I have an extract from El Relator, published at Bogota shortly after the revolution, that constitutes an indictment against the Republic of Colombia without scarcely a parallel in the history of governments. It is impossible for the imagination to conceive a more despotic course pursued toward a province than the Bogota Government pursued toward the Department of Panama. The extract alluded to is as follows:

> We have converted the lords and masters of that territory [Panama] into pariahs of their native soils. We have cut their rights and suppressed all their liberties unexpectedly. We have robbed them of the most precious faculty of a free people—that of electing their mandataries, their legislators, their judges.
> We have restricted for them the right of suffrage; we have falsified the count of votes; we have made prevalent over the popular will the will of a mercenary soldiery and that of a series of employees entirely strange to the interests of the Department; we have taken away from them the right of law-making, and as a compensation we have put them under the iron yoke of exceptional laws; state, provinces, and municipalities have lost entirely the autonomy which they were enjoying formerly. * * *
> In towns of a cosmopolitan character of the Isthmus we did not found any national schools where children could learn our religion, our language, our history, and how to love their country. In the face of the world we have punished with imprisonment, with expulsion, with fines, and whippings the writers for the innocent expression of the thought. Since December, 1884, to October, 1903, the presidents, governors, secretaries, prefects, mayors, chiefs of police, military chiefs, officials and soldiers, inspectors of police, the police itself, captains and surgeons of harbors, magistrates, judges of all descriptions, State attorneys, everybody came from the high plains of the Andes and from other parts of the Republic to impose on the Isthmus the will, the law, or the whims of the more powerful, to sell justice, or speculate with the treasury. This series of employers, similar to an octopus with its multiple arms, was sucking the blood of an oppressed people and was devouring what only the Panamaians had right to devour.
> We have made of the Isthmus a real military province, and when this nation of 350,000 souls had men of continental reputation like Justo Arosemana, legislators of the first order, and of an irresistible popularity like Pablo Arosemana and like Gil Colunje, men of talent like Ardila, brilliant diplomats like Hurtado, and scientific celebrities of European reputation like Soea we leave them aside, we relegate them in contempt and in forgetfulness instead of putting them at the head of the Isthmus in order to quench the thirst of equity and justice and satisfy the legitimate aspirations of all the Panamaians. Such a way of proceeding has wounded the pride, the dignity, and the patriotism of all the intellectual people of the Isthmus, and has provoked and developed the hatred and the anger of the popular mass.
> The result is of all those errors—we are touching them now! The last twenty years have been for the Panamaians too bitter and too sad, and they will never in the future like to be Colombians if they have to continue to live under a régime that did not allow them to be citizens in their own territory.

What more natural than that the people of the Isthmus, in view of their past history, and the recent action at Bogota, should seek to throw off their allegiance to the parent government? What else was there left for them to do? Every sentiment of self-interest commanded them to take the step when they saw that the treaty was doomed to defeat. They took counsel of their own future welfare; they laid carefully their plans; there was no division of sentiment among them, and on the 3d of November, 1903, they moved as by a common impulse. They took possession of their own country, and set up their own independence. They were guilty of no barbarities; they avoided bloodshed, and treated their oppressors with rare forbearance and kindly consideration.

Did the Administration inspire the revolution that it might despoil Colombia of her property upon the Isthmus? Such has been the virtual charge made. It has been made both by direct statement and innuendo. It is a grave and serious charge, and it is worth our while to pause and observe whether or not it is well founded in fact. From what we have observed of the history of Panama prior to the revolution the only wonder is that separation was so long postponed. No people ever had better warrant for renouncing allegiance to their government than had the people of the Department of Panama on the 3d of last November.

Notwithstanding the wrongs which they were obliged to endure, they would undoubtedly have continued to submit to the rule of Colombia if their long-cherished hope of a canal had been gratified.

Our Government was fully informed of the state of public feeling in Colombia, and it also knew the intense desire of the people of Panama for the prompt ratification of the treaty.

It was obvious from the beginning of the consideration of the treaty that a crisis was near at hand. On May 7, 1903, our minister said:

> The probabilities are that when the measure (treaty) is presented to Congress there will be a lengthy debate and an adverse vote. Then the representatives of the coast Departments of the Cauca, Panama, and Bolivar will ask for a reconsideration and urge a ratification of the convention as the only means of preventing the secession of those Departments and the attempt to constitute of their territories an independent republic.

The treaty was rejected by the Senate on August 12, and three days later our minister reported:

> Since the rejection of the treaty on the 12th instant there has been an almost hysterical condition of alarm and uncertainty in Bogota as to the future action of the United States.

On September 11 he further advised the State Department as follows:

> I have the honor to report that events of interest have taken place in connection with the appointment of Senator Obaldia to the post of governor of the Department of Panama. Senator Obaldia's separatist tendencies are well known, and he is reported to have said that, should the canal treaty not pass, the Department of Panama would declare its independence, and would be right in doing so.

On October 31 he said:

> The people here are in great anxiety over conflicting reports of secession movements in the Cauca and Panama.

As was foreshadowed at Bogota, as soon as Congress adjourned without ratifying the treaty, the Department of Panama revolted and set up her independence.

It becomes important in view of what has been said in opposition, to ascertain what our rights were, and what was done by the Government at the time of and subsequent to the revolution. The record is before us, accessible to everyone. The facts are spread before the world, and we may judge whether, in what was done, our officials acted in contravention of our national obligations.

For nearly sixty years the United States has had very important rights across the Isthmus which were derived from the treaty of 1846. By article 35 of the convention New Granada (Colombia) stipulated—

> The Government of New Granada guarantees to the Government of the United States that the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama upon any modes of communication that now exist, or that may be hereafter constructed, shall be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States, and for the transportation of any articles of produce, manufactures, or merchandise, of lawful commerce, belonging to the citizens of the United States.

It further provided that—

> In order to secure to themselves the tranquil and constant enjoyment of these advantages, and as an especial compensation for the said advantages and for the favors they have acquired by the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of this treaty, the United States guarantee positively and efficaciously to New Granada, by the present stipulation, the perfect neutrality of the before-mentioned Isthmus, with the view that the free transit from the one to the other sea, may not be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time while this treaty exists; and in consequence, the United States also guarantee, in the same manner, the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has and possesses over the said territory.

This treaty conferred upon the United States a very substantial right and privilege, and that was the right and privilege of open and free transit across the Isthmus. The necessity of safeguarding the property and lives of the people of the United States across the Isthmus, which was inhabited by many people who had not thoroughly emerged from a state of savagery, was vitally important. The United States has exercised the right to protect her own interests at all times and under all circumstances since she entered into the enjoyment of the privilege granted by the treaty. Secretary Hay says:

> The United States has * * * assumed and discharged, as if primarily responsible, duties which in the first instance rested on Colombia. According to the language of the treaty, the right of the Government and people of the United States to a free and open transit across the Isthmus was guaranteed by New Granada; but the United States has been able to secure the benefits of it only by its own exertions; and in only one instance, and that as far back as 1857, has it been able to obtain from Colombia any compensation for the injuries and losses resulting from her failure to perform her obligation.

The United States by the article above mentioned guaranteed the sovereignty of New Granada over the Isthmus. The generally accepted interpretation of the meaning and effect of this guaranty is that the United States did not undertake to maintain such sovereignty except against foreign powers; that she did not engage to protect her against overthrow by domestic convulsion.

Referring to this provision of the treaty, Secretary Seward said, in 1865:

> The question which has recently arisen under the thirty-fifth article of the treaty with New Granada, as to the obligation of this Government to comply with a requisition of the President of the United States of Colombia for a force to protect the Isthmus of Panama from invasion by a body of insurgents of that country has been submitted to the consideration of the Attorney-General. His opinion is that neither the text nor the spirit of the stipulation in that article, by which the United States engages to preserve the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama, imposes an obligation on this Government to comply with a requisition like that referred to. The purpose of the stipulation was to guarantee the Isthmus against seizure or invasion by a foreign power only. It could not have been contemplated that we were to become a party to any civil war in that country by defending the Isthmus against another party. As it may be presumed, however, that our object in entering into such a stipulation was to secure the freedom of transit across the Isthmus, if that freedom should be endangered or obstructed, the employment of force on our part to prevent this would be a question of grave expediency to be determined by circumstances.

The effort to connect this Government with the revolution has been industriously made. The searchlight has been applied in every direction in the quest of information which would support the charge of complicity of the Administration in the movement.

We must consider this subject not upon idle rumor or unfounded assertion, but from the record which the Government has made. That record is written; there it stands irreversible. By it, and by it alone, the Administration must be judged. As for myself, I shall accept the record as it has been made by the executive department and submitted to the Congress unless it is impeached by something more conclusive than vague suspicion, unsupported assertion, and wild conjecture.

In the orderly administration of the affairs of the Government it is necessary that each of the three departments should repose trust and confidence in the acts of the others performed within their proper sphere of action. We must proceed upon the assumption that the executive department, within its constitutional prerogatives, is actuated by proper motives, and that it is as regardful of the good name of the country as either the legislative or the judicial departments.

But it is said that the precautionary measures adopted interfered with the assertion of her sovereignty by the Colombian Government. Whether that is so, we have no means of knowing, except as we are advised by the executive department. We are informed by that department that the independence of Panama was secured by the people thereof upon their own initiative, and without the exercise of force, improper or otherwise, on the part of the United States.

Who shall determine what steps should be taken to make secure peace and protect our people from harm upon the line of transit? A determined revolution was at hand under circumstances dissimilar to any that had preceded it. Bloodshed was apparently imminent, and interruption to the highway across the Isthmus was among the reasonably early probabilities. What was the duty of the President under the circumstances? Who should determine what should be done in that serious exigency? Obviously, the Chief Executive was to decide, and manifestly the duty devolved upon him to take such steps as in his judgment were necessary to preserve the lives of Americans and to maintain unbroken peace.

The primary right of the United States to protect freedom of transit exists without reference to the treaty. It rests upon the fundamental law of self-preservation. But I think the right is clearly inferred from the language of the treaty itself. Colombia expressly guarantees the freedom of transit. It is a collateral obligation and expressly implies that the primary duty rests upon someone else. Obviously that duty rests, and could only rest, upon the United States. Others, I am aware, hold that by the terms of the treaty the primary duty of protecting the highway rested upon Colombia, but the difference of view is of no practical importance, for the United States usually has assumed and discharged the duty of preserving the transit free from interruption.

Under the treaty of 1846 and the protection of the United States, Panama "has become a great commercial highway between the nations of the coasts of western Europe and eastern Asia, as well as between the western and eastern coasts of the United States."

The Panama Railroad, chartered by the legislature of New York in 1849 and opened to commerce in 1855, has carried millions of passengers and millions of tons of freight.

It is fair to say that for more than half a century the people of the world have looked to the United States to see that life and property upon this great highway were made secure against attacks from either the citizens of Panama or those of any other country. And when the revolution of November last was imminent, under circumstances that promised a more determined resistance than any which had preceded it, it was not only the right of the President of the United States to adopt such measures as he deemed essential for the general safety, but it was a solemn duty which rested upon him to protect the lives and property of the people of other nations, who had so long relied upon the protecting care of the United States. If loss and damage had ensued because of his having failed to adopt reasonable measures for their protection a heavy moral responsibility would have rested upon him.

He had no guide except his own conception of executive duty. What others had done before, or what others might do in the existing situation, afforded no absolute criterion to him. He must be governed by his own view of responsibility. Possibly no one in this Chamber, under the same circumstances, inspired by the same exalted purpose, would have read his duty in the same way as the President. Some might have regarded no precautions at all necessary; others might have considered the situation so menacing as to have justified ampler provision. The fundamental fact which I seek to emphasize is this: That the President was in the very nature of the situation clothed with large discretionary power, and it seems to me, in view of all that occurred, and in the light of all that has followed, no one can say that he did not act well within the limits of sound executive discretion.

He informed Congress in his last annual message that his instructions were in accordance with our rights as interpreted by former Administrations. "The duty of the United States in the premises," he says, "was clear. In strict accordance with the principles laid down by Secretaries Cass and Seward * * * the United States gave notice that it would permit the landing of no expeditionary force, the arrival of which would mean chaos and destruction along the line of the railroad and of the proposed canal, and an interruption of transit as an inevitable consequence."

We are not left in doubt or in the dark as to what the Administration did with respect to the revolution. From what transpired at Bogota it was perfectly manifest that a revolt was imminent. The public press published broadcast accounts of the rising revolutionary spirit. As early as August 31, 1902, a report was sent to the Washington Post from San Jose, Costa Rica, saying:

> Travelers from Panama report the Isthmus alive with fires of a new revolution. It is inspired, it is believed, by men who, in Panama and Colon, have systematically engendered the pro-American feeling to secure the building of the isthmian canal by the United States.
> The consensus of opinion gathered from late arrivals from the Isthmus is that the revolution is coming, and that it will succeed.

Later it was reported, in the press of New York and Washington, that troops were being gathered by Colombia for use in connection with the revolution. That military demonstrations were liable to occur upon the line of transit across the Isthmus, was perfectly manifest. American citizens and American property were there. Should no steps be taken by the Administration to safeguard them? We can readily account for the action of the President upon principles entirely consistent with the national honor. As for myself, I prefer to do so. That which was done in the exigency with which we are familiar, was done to protect American interests. If the revolutionists derived therefrom any moral advantage, who shall say that wrong was done? There is good ground for the belief that the Panamaians would long ago have achieved their independence but for the attitude of the United States in the purely domestic affairs of Colombia.

Secretary Hay says in his note to General Reyes the 5th of this month that—

> Advices came to this Government, not only through the press but also through its own officials, of the existence of dangerous conditions on the Isthmus, as well as in the adjacent States whose interests were menaced. Disorders in that quarter were not new. In the summer of 1902, as well as in that of 1901, this Government had been obliged by its forces to maintain order on the transit route, and it took steps, as it had done on previous occasions, to perform a similar duty should the necessity arise. The form the trouble might take could not be foreseen, but it was important to guard against any destructive effects.
> The reasonableness of these precautions soon became evident.

On November 3, at 6 o'clock, the uprising in Panama occurred. Prior to this time what word was said, or act done, in derogation of our national duty? We are not left in uncertainty as to what was done, for Secretary Hay says emphatically in his note to General Reyes, January 5, 1904:

> Any charge that this Government, or any responsible member of it, held intercourse, whether official or unofficial, with agents of revolution in Colombia, is utterly without justification.
> Equally so is the insinuation that any action of this Government, prior to the revolution in Panama, was the result of complicity with the plans of the revolutionists. The Department sees fit to make these denials, and it makes them finally.

This is a complete refutation of the charge that this Government had any complicity with those engaged in the revolutionary movement. The American people will accept the emphatic denial of the Secretary of State without question or doubt.

More than this: We have the positive assurance of the President of the United States that this Government did not undertake to set on foot the revolution. There was nothing occult or "sinister," to employ the language of the opposition, in the course of the Government. It had no advices with respect to the contemplated uprising which were not possessed by every observer of passing events. In his message of the 4th of last month the President says:

> I think proper to say, therefore, that no one connected with this Government had any part in preparing, inciting, or encouraging the late revolution on the Isthmus of Panama, and that save from the reports of our military and naval officers, given above, no one connected with this Government had any previous knowledge of the revolution except such as was accessible to any person of ordinary intelligence who read the newspapers and kept up a current acquaintance with public affairs.

This is a deliberate and important utterance, and far outweighs all assertions and insinuations of "guilty knowledge" on the part of the Government in which some have been pleased to indulge. No one can misunderstand it; and it will be accepted everywhere as conclusive.

We had no troops upon the Isthmus and only one ship, the Nashville, at Colon. She arrived on November 2. On the 3d she was ordered in the interest of peace to make every effort to prevent Government troops landed at that point from proceeding to Panama, and to keep open the transit across the Isthmus and to maintain order. Commander Hubbard, who displayed admirable courage and good judgment under serious circumstances, gives a detailed account of what transpired after his arrival. On the morning of the 3d of November the Colombian gunboat Cartagena arrived and disembarked four or five hundred troops without hindrance by the commander of the Nashville. The Panama Railroad Company would not transport them to Panama except upon the request of the governor of Panama. Commander Hubbard learned on the night of the 3d that the provisional government had been established at Panama. Says he:

> I sent, early in the morning of November 4, written notification to the general superintendent of the Panama Railroad, to the prefect of Colon, and to the officer left in command of the Colombian troops, later ascertained to be Colonel Torres, that I had prohibited the transportation of troops in either direction, in order to preserve the free and uninterrupted transit of the Isthmus.

On November 4 Colonel Torres, in command of the Colombian troops at Colon, practically made war against the United States.

At 1 o'clock p. m. on that date I was summoned on shore—

The commander says—

by a preconcerted signal, and on landing met the United States consul, vice-consul, and Colonel Shaler, the general superintendent of the Panama Railroad. The consul informed me that he had received notice from the officer comanding the Colombian troops, Colonel Torres, through the prefect of Colon, to the effect that if the Colombian officers, Generals Tobal and Amaya, who had been seized in Panama on the evening of the 3d of November by the Independents and held as prisoners, were not released by 2 o'clock p. m., he, Torres, would open fire on the town of Colon and kill every United States citizen in the place, and my advice and action were requested.

I advised that all the United States citizens should take refuge in the shed of the Panama Railroad Company, a stone building susceptible of being put into good state for defense, and that I would immediately land such body of men, with extra arms for arming the citizens, as the complement of the ship would permit. This was agreed to, and I immediately returned on board, arriving at 1.15 p. m. The order for landing was immediately given, and at 1.30 p. m. the boats left the ship with a party of 42 men under the command of Lieut. Commander H. M. Witzel, with Midshipman J. P. Jackson as second in command. Time being pressing, I gave verbal orders to Mr. Witzel to take the building above referred to, to put it into the best state of defense possible, and protect the lives of the citizens assembled there—not firing unless fired upon. The women and children took refuge on the German steamer Marcomania and Panama Railroad steamer City of Washington, both ready to haul out from dock if necessary.

The Nashville I got underway and patrolled with her along the water front close in and ready to use either small-arm or shrapnel fire. The Colombians surrounded the building of the railroad company almost immediately after we had taken possession, and for about one and a half hours their attitude was most threatening, it being seemingly their purpose to provoke an attack. Happily our men were cool and steady, and while the tension was very great, no shot was fired. At about 3.15 p. m. Colonel Torres came into the building for an interview and expressed himself as most friendly to Americans, claiming that the whole affair was a misapprehension and that he would like to send the alcalde of Colon to Panama to see General Tobal and have him direct the discontinuance of the show of force.

I am positive—

He further says—that the determined attitude of our men, their coolness and evident intention of standing their ground, had a most salutary and decisive effect on the immediate situation, and was the initial step in the ultimate abandoning of Colon by these troops and their return to Cartagena the following day. Lieutenant-Commander Witzel is entitled to much praise for his admirable work in command on the spot.

I feel that I can not sufficiently strongly represent to the Department the grossness of this outrage and the insult to our dignity, even apart from the savagery of the threat.

On the following day the commander, finding that the Colombian troops had not been withdrawn by Colonel Torres as far from the town as had been agreed, and were occupying buildings near the outskirts, relanded an armed force and reoccupied the building occupied the day previous. He—also landed two 1-pounders and mounted them on platform cars behind protection of cotton bales, and then in company with the United States consul had an interview with Colonel Torres, in the course of which I informed him—that I had relanded my men because he had not kept his agreement; that I had no interest in the affairs of either party; that my attitude was strictly neutral; that the troops of neither side should be transported; that my sole purpose in landing was to protect the lives and property of American citizens if threatened, as they had been threatened, and to maintain the free and uninterrupted transit of the Isthmus, and that purpose I should maintain by force if necessary. I also strongly advised that in the interests of peace, and to prevent the possibility of a conflict that could not but be regrettable, he should carry out his agreement of the previous evening and withdraw to Monkey Hill.

Said he—

During the evening negotiations were pending with Colonel Torres by representatives of the new Government, and he was persuaded "to embark on the Royal Mail steamer Orinoco, with all his troops, and return to Cartagena." The troops numbered 474 all told.

I beg to assure the Department—

Says Commander Hubbard in conclusion—that I had no part whatever in the negotiations that were carried on between Colonel Torres and the representatives of the provisional government; that I landed an armed force only when the lives of American citizens were threatened, and withdrew this force as soon as there seemed to be no grounds for further apprehension of injury to American lives or property; that I relanded an armed force because of the failure of Colonel Torres to carry out his agreement to withdraw and announced intention of returning, and that my attitude throughout was strictly neutral as between the two parties, my only purpose being to protect the lives and property of American citizens and to preserve the free and uninterrupted transit of the Isthmus.

Who will gainsay the truth of this report? Is there any act recorded here in violation of any treaty rights or obligations? If we are to believe the commander—and who doubts him?—is he not to be commended, and the Government he represented also, for having protected the lives and property of American citizens, for having avoided bloodshed, and for having prevented interruption of transit upon the Isthmus?

The opposition seems to regard it improbable that Panama could have successfully asserted her independence except for the support of the United States. That the disparity in numbers between Panama and the parent Government was such that Colombia could have readily established her sovereignty in the revolting province but for the alleged intervention of the United States. We should bear in mind the fact that but for the assistance of the United States, undoubtedly Colombia would long ago have lost Panama. This was made clear in the very able speech of the junior Senator from Iowa. It was also made manifest by the President in his last annual message. He says:

The experience of over half a century has shown Colombia to be utterly incapable of keeping order in the Isthmus. Only the active interference of the United States has enabled her to preserve so much as a semblance of sovereignty.

We should bear in mind the further fact that the seeds of revolution are in the blood of Colombia, and that they are not a loyal, homogeneous mass like ourselves. Colombia fully realized her insecure hold upon her provinces, and that the defiance of Panama might be followed by the revolt of other departments. We have already observed that there was early a fear at Bogota that Cauca, Bolivar, and Panama might set up their independence. When Panama revolted Colombia knew that she had not only to regain Panama, but that she might be obliged to take into serious consideration a revolt in the departments of Cauca and Bolivar also.

Furthermore, it should be remembered that Colombia had but recently emerged from a three years' war which sorely taxed her resources, and she was in no condition to compel so remote a province as Panama to submit to her authority after it had firmly resolved to withdraw from the Federation and had prepared to maintain her independence at any cost. The message of the Vice-President, transmitting the treaty to the Congress at Bogota, shows the extreme weakness of the General Government. It is a pitiful story, and I refer to it only to show how improbable it was that such a government could maintain its sovereignty in Panama when the people in that province unanimously rose against it.

The profound disturbance of the public order—which began in 1899, prevented the fulfillment of the laws in regard to elections, and consequently the reunion of Congress which ought to have taken place in 1900 and 1902.

Says the Executive—

Therefore there arose a political situation unforeseen by the constitution and the law, in that the Government was forced to assume the functions of legislation as well as to protect itself against those who sought to destroy it by force, and to attend to the satisfaction of many necessities of all classes.

One of these necessities was that the National Congress should be formed and reunited, but this could not be attended to during the war, because many of the cities of the Republic were occupied, either continuously or for short times, by the forces of the rebels, and on this account the legal authorities could not reside in them nor exercise their proper functions.

The President promptly recognized the independence of Panama. He has the constitutional power to recognize new states. He may receive ministers and ambassadors from and may commission ministers and ambassadors to foreign governments. He does this clearly in the exercise of an executive function. In commissioning ministers and ambassadors he must do so by and with the consent and advice of the Senate, but he may receive ministers and ambassadors from foreign governments without sharing the responsibility therefor with the Senate or with any of the other departments of the Government. He acts solely in this regard according to his own official discretion.

The hour when a revolting state has secured its independence is a question of fact which each recognizing government must determine for itself. When the President, in his judgment, believes independence has been asserted and secured, he may recognize the fact. Recognition does not depend upon the lapse of time, but it is predicated upon the existence of an ascertained fact. While the independence of Panama was for a time denied, it has at last become a generally acknowledged fact, so that there is little profit in the further discussion of the principles upon which recognition is predicated.

It should be observed that the United States has some very important rights and duties in Panama which the revolution and change of government did not extinguish. They arise out of Article XXXV of the treaty of 1846. The express grant of the right of free transit across the Isthmus contained in this article constituted, as has been well said by others, a servitude which, as it were, ran with the land, or a burden upon the sovereignty which became a subsisting obligation upon whatever power should succeed to the rights of New Granada in the Isthmus of Panama. In other words, the right of free transit across the Isthmus was a continuing privilege during the life of the convention which New Granada and every government succeeding her was bound to observe and respect. In consideration of this privilege the United States guaranteed the sovereignty of New Granada upon the Isthmus, and the governments succeeding in Panama would enjoy the same guaranty.

The Republic of Panama has succeeded New Granada (Colombia) upon the Isthmus, and it follows that her sovereignty is effectively guaranteed by the United States against alien invasion.

It has been urged repeatedly that there has been and is no republic in Panama with capacity to enter into a valid convention with the United States. There is, it is true, no government under a written constitution conforming to our opinion of all of the essentials of republican institutions, but there has been since the day of the revolution, and there is to-day, a government in Panama exercising governmental functions. It is not essential that there should be any particular form of government before a people can enter into a valid international engagement.

Any form of organization which for the time being expresses the popular will has the power, in my humble opinion, to enter into a treaty compact with other powers. A treaty is but an agreement of the people in their collective capacity made through their agency, the government. The government may be a republic in fact or in name. It may be a dictatorship or a kingdom, or it may be of any other form which the wit of man can devise. Mere form necessarily is not of the essence; the controlling consideration is, does the government in fact speak the voice of the people? If so, it may firmly bind them in their international relations.

The Government of Panama since the revolution has been discharging its functions peacefully and satisfactorily. The people yield it their loyal allegiance. There is, so far as we are advised, no domestic discord.

Under these circumstances it is plain to me that we are treating with a sovereign power, one which in fact and under sound principles of law may enter into treaty relations with the United States. It may grant to us the requisite concessions for an interoceanic canal which we may rightfully enjoy.

There has been some discussion during the debate of the relative merits of the Nicaragua and Panama routes. It is obvious from what has been said that the course of the Administration in Panama is antagonized by some because it did not abandon the Panama route when the Colombian Government rejected the treaty and proceed with the acquisition of concessions and the construction of the canal through Nicaragua and Costa Rica. It is urged that a "reasonable time," within the contemplation of the Spooner law, in which the President should obtain the necessary concessions from Colombia, expired as soon as the Colombian Government rejected the treaty, and, by force of the provisions of the law, the President was driven to adopt the Nicaragua route.

It is unnecessary to recite the considerations which led Congress to prefer the Panama to the Nicaragua route. The great, preponderating sentiment of the Congress was and is, I believe, in favor of the former. It is obvious, however, that if Congress had committed itself absolutely to the Panama route, the Government would have been left at great disadvantage in negotiating terms with the Colombian Government.

It was very wisely provided that in the event suitable terms could not be obtained from Colombia within a "reasonable time," then the Nicaragua route should be adopted. But this, regarded at the time by many Senators as a prudential provision, was not indicative, by any means, that the two routes were substantially alike available, or that it was a matter of little difference which was adopted. It was my belief at the time the Spooner law was enacted that the Panama Canal was far preferable to any other, and that the utmost reasonable effort should be made to secure its construction.

In what the President has done in attempting to secure the Panama route he has acted clearly within the letter and spirit of the Spooner Act. What is a "reasonable time" contemplated by the act? In the eye of the law it must depend upon the circumstances of the particular case. What would be a "reasonable time" in one case would be quite the reverse in another. While the subject of an interoceanic canal has been long under consideration, the fact is but a comparatively brief period has been spent by us in seriously considering the practical features of the subject.

Two years were consumed by the Walker Commission in examining the entire canal situation and making report of its conclusions. When its report was submitted to Congress we were then, and not before, prepared to act intelligently. Congress enacted the Spooner bill into law, under which the President was charged with the duty of negotiating a treaty with Colombia. The negotiations were taken up promptly and pushed to a conclusion with all reasonable dispatch. The Senate ratified the treaty. It was submitted to the Colombian Congress for its approval and was rejected. All of this transpired within less than a year and a half after the passage of the Spooner bill.

When the Colombian Congress rejected the treaty that did not necessarily close the door to further effort to carry out the manifest will of Congress in the construction of the Panama Canal. It delayed but did not necessarily defeat the accomplishment of the Congressional desire. It did not relieve the President from persisting in any reasonable effort still to secure it. The subject is a large one and must be dealt with in a large way. Making treaties between governments upon important subjects is at best a tedious process. No body in the world is more familiar with this fact than the Senate of the United States. In many instances years are consumed in the negotiation and ratification of treaties with other powers; treaties of far less importance than one dealing with the construction of an isthmian canal. It seems to me that we can well afford to be as deliberate in this great transaction as in any other with which we are familiar. The advantages of Panama over Nicaragua are so much superior that we could easily justify the President in the expenditure of much more time than he has consumed in an effort to secure the treaty desired. He has not violated either the letter or the spirit of the Spooner Act in not immediately dropping Panama and going to Nicaragua when the Congress at Bogota rejected the treaty. He has been, on the contrary, acting clearly within the intendment of Congress.

There are several conclusions which the record seems to establish. They may be summarized thus:

The revolution by the people of Panama was due to a long series of wrongs inflicted upon them by the Government at Bogota, and more particularly to the rejection of the Hay-Herran treaty.

The revolution was initiated by the people of Panama and was not inspired by the United States.

It was the duty of the President to adopt such measures as he deemed necessary to preserve the freedom of transit across the Isthmus and to protect the lives and property of American citizens, and of citizens of other countries upon the line of transit.

The independence of Panama was accomplished by the people of the Isthmus.

There was no vessel or armed force of the United States at the city of Panama, and only one vessel, the Nashville, third rate, at Colon; only 42 marines were landed at Colon. They were landed to protect the lives of American citizens who were in serious and imminent peril and were returned to the ship after accomplishing their purpose.

The President recognized the fact that Panama had secured her independence three days after the revolution.

In recognizing the independence of the new Republic the President acted solely within his constitutional rights. The duty of recognition rested upon him, and having exercised it his act became binding upon the United States.

The independence of the Republic of Panama was recognized by France and many other powers soon after recognition by the United States.

Within eight days after the recognition of the new Republic she signed a treaty with the United States, through her accredited minister to Washington, granting to the United States the requisite concessions for an isthmian canal.

When the Republic of Panama concluded the treaty with the United States, she was in the exercise of sovereign power. She was discharging fully her domestic and international functions and had full capacity to enter into a valid convention with the United States.

Under the treaty of 1846, the United States obtained rights and incurred obligations in Panama. She obtained the right of free transit across the Isthmus and the right to preserve the freedom of such transit. She also guaranteed in consideration of this right and other privileges the sovereignty of the government in Panama. By the transfer of sovereignty upon the Isthmus to the Republic of Panama, the obligation to guarantee her sovereignty against foreign aggression rests upon the United States.

If the new treaty with the Republic of Panama is ratified by the Senate, the United States will obtain adequate concessions, rights, and privileges for the construction and perpetual maintenance of an isthmian canal.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to consider only the more salient features of the Panama question, and those which appear to me to be controlling. Much more might be said, but there would appear to be little profit in unduly prolonging the discussion. In one form or another the isthmian canal question has been under consideration for several centuries. The time for decisive action has come. We have but to call the roll of the Senate upon the treaty with Panama, and we will instantly set in motion the machinery which will soon accomplish the great desire.

Others have said that this is an American question, and so it is. It transcends the narrow bounds of party. It is as wide as the ample limits of the Republic.

Who doubts in the present condition of affairs that the Panama Canal will be built? It will have back of it the best pledge any vast undertaking can have, for it will have the assurance of the United States. What we say for and against it will swiftly fade away and be gone forever, but the canal—the rich fruit of four centuries of hope and human effort, the colossal tribute of our people to the commerce of the world—will stand. Yes, we can well believe that it will survive the pyramids.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. President, I do not intend to address the Senate in support of the general proposition that an isthmian canal should be constructed by the United States Government. This matter has passed out of the domain of discussion. It is no longer treated in the public policies of the country as a matter of mere utility; it is recognized as one of the absolute necessities of our situation at this time. No section of the country has more thoroughly recognized this as the proper attitude of the Government than the section from which I come. This condition of opinion is due in no small degree to a knowledge of the fact that our people are to be among the chiefest and most immediate beneficiaries of a successful consummation of the enterprise. These benefits have been heretofore discussed at such great length and in such complete detail that it will serve no useful purpose to restate them now. For the present, further progress toward the actual construction of the canal depends upon the ratification of the pending treaty recently negotiated by the United States Government with the Republic of Panama.

Ordinarily, in determining what course it is proper to pursue, it would only be necessary to consider (1) the competency of the parties to enter into the contract, and (2) the terms and provisions of the contract submitted for approval by the Senate.

The second of these considerations is not deemed to present any obstacle in this instance, because it is conceded that whilst the terms of the present treaty do not concede anything to the United States by way of mere donation, it does exceed in the liberality of its provisions any that we have heretofore been able to secure for the purpose of acquiring authority to construct an isthmian canal. Within the past year the Hay-Herran treaty providing for the construction of the canal upon the same site, containing terms much less favorable to the United States, met the almost unanimous approval of the Senate and the country. On the score of the mere provisions of the treaty, there seems to be no dissatisfaction expressed, either here or elsewhere.

On the question of the competency of the Republic of Panama to make a treaty there is more dispute, and this presents, directly and indirectly, the chief cause of division and consequent opposition.

That actual recognition has been extended to the Republic of Panama by the President of the United States in formally receiving its minister and by this Senate in confirming the appointment by the President of a minister from this Government to Panama is not and will not be denied. That it has taken place in accordance with the forms of law prescribed in such cases is also a matter not subject to dispute. Under our system the matter of extending recognition to a new government may be said to exist concurrently and independently in those departments of Government which are said to be political; that is to say, the legislative and executive branches. I think it may be safely asserted that the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States is that it will respect and enforce, in so far as it is called upon to deal with the question at all, a recognition made either by the President or by the legislative branch of the Government.

In some of the opinions of that court expressions are to be found to the effect that the power of recognition is in the political departments of the Government, naming as such the legislative and executive branches. It was plainly not the intention of the court in saying that the power was to be exercised by the legislative and executive departments of the Government to convey the meaning that it was to be exercised by these acting in conjunction, the one putting limitations upon the power of the other. In none of the cases before the court, and in which these expressions are to be found, did the legislative branch of the Government have any part in making the recognition which was deemed sufficient to give to the new government the status of a litigant in that court or the existence of which was made an element in the rights of any litigant who resorted to that tribunal for their adjudication. This statement of the doctrine of the Supreme Court is not different from that in which Andrew Jackson and Henry Clay agreed upon as being a proper method in which the right of recognition is to be exercised.

On June 18, 1836, referring to the matter of the independence of Texas, Mr. Clay, in a report from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations (S. Doc. No. 406, 24th Cong., 1st sess.), said:

> The recognition of * * * an independent power may be made by the United States in various ways. First, by treaty; second, by the passage of a law regulating commercial intercourse between the two powers; third, by sending a diplomatic agent * * * with the usual credentials; or, lastly, by the Executive receiving and accrediting a diplomatic representative from the power in question, which would be a recognition as far as the Executive only is competent to make it. In the first and third modes the concurrence of the Senate in its executive capacity would be necessary, and in the second in its legislative character.
> The Senate alone, without the cooperation of some other branch of the Government, is not competent to recognize the existence of any power.
> The President of the United States, by the Constitution, has the charge of their foreign intercourse. Regularly he ought to take the initiative in the acknowledgment of the independence of any new power. But in this case he has not yet done it, for reasons which he, without doubt, deems sufficient. If in any instance the President should be tardy, he may be quickened in the exercise of his power by the expression of the opinion, or by other acts, of one or both branches of Congress, as was done in relation to the republics formed out of Spanish America.

Together with this report a resolution was submitted to the Senate from the Committee on Foreign Relations that was as follows:

> Resolved, That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States whenever satisfactory information shall be received that it has in successful operation a civil government capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power.

President Jackson, in approving this resolution, expressed his satisfaction with the course taken, and said that it was entirely proper for the legislative branch to make any suggestion which in its judgment it felt it to be expedient for the Executive to consider in connection with the discharge of public duties.

On July 1, 1836, this resolution being in debate in the Senate, Mr. Webster said he was willing to go so far as to vote funds to enable the President to send out a proper minister, but against a direct recognition he thought there existed strong objections, because it was the proper function of the President to take the lead in this matter.

In a debate in the House in the following year John Quincy Adams said (February 27, 1837) he objected to the proposition before the House on the ground that the act of recognition of a foreign power had heretofore always been an Executive act of this Government. It was the business and duty of the President of the United States, and Mr. Adams was not willing to set the example of giving that recognition on the part of the legislative body without recommendation of the Executive.

It will thus be seen that President Jackson and Mr. Clay agreed that while the power of recognition by the President was implied in the power to receive foreign ministers, and that if he should exercise the power without invoking the aid and support of the legislative branch, his action in that respect would be beyond question, yet it was conceded that where the willingness of the legislative branch to assume responsibility for the recognition of a new government, in advance of the President being satisfied that it was prudent and proper to do so, a suggestion from the Congress that if the President should, through the regularly constituted channels, extend recognition, he would be supported by the legislative branch in any consequences that might ensue, was not only not an offensive suggestion, but one within the competency of Congress to make. This, I take it, Congress could do in connection with any duty which the President is called upon to discharge where the public peace and welfare might be involved in his action.

In the present case the Republic of Panama has received the recognition of this Government through the act of the President in receiving her minister and in negotiating a treaty with her. This action on the part of the President, in my opinion, is not subject to review in any proceeding, directly or collaterally, connected with the ratification of the pending treaty. The recognition, no matter whether by the action of the Congress or by the President alone, is the act of the Government of the United States and is to be respected and supported as such. The recognition is final, and the existence of Panama is a fact accomplished, and this, to borrow a phrase from Bismarck, removes every objection and silences every dispute. Approval of our course, if approval by others of anything this country does can ever be deemed to add anything to its validity or justice, is shown in the action taken by other governments, as follows:

List of governments which have recognized the independence of Panama, with the dates of recognition.

United States	Nov. 13, 1903	Nicaragua	Dec. 15, 1903
France	Nov. 16, 1903	Peru	Dec. 19, 1903
China	Nov. 26, 1903	Cuba	Dec. 23, 1903
Austria-Hungary	Nov. 27, 1903	Great Britain	Dec. 24, 1903
Germany	Nov. 30, 1903	Italy	Dec. 24, 1903
Denmark	Dec. 3, 1903	Japan	Dec. 28, 1903
Russia	Dec. 6, 1903	Costa Rica	Dec. 28, 1903
Sweden and Norway	Dec. 7, 1903	Switzerland	Dec. 28, 1903
Belgium	Dec. 9, 1903	The Netherlands	Jan. 10, 1904

The terms of the treaty being satisfactory and the technical competency of the parties to the contract being established, my support of this treaty would follow naturally and without further question. But it is objected that while the recognition of the Republic of Panama may conform to the mere forms of the law governing such matters, the facts which preceded it show such an utter disregard by the President and those acting under his orders of the cardinal principles of right and justice as to make it the imperative duty of every right-thinking man to condemn his actions and to refuse to take any steps that can directly or indirectly be construed into a condonation of his course; that, while it is admitted that there is no issue pending in the Senate, and that none can be framed for consideration here by which this body can directly review that act of recognition, and if found to have been improperly given to recall the same and restore the status quo existing at the time it was extended by the President, it is contended that there is an indirect remedy, to be found in the power of the Senate to refuse to ratify the pending treaty.

And it is earnestly and forcibly insisted that the necessity and justification for thus penalizing an enterprise which means so much to the country arises from the greater obligation to preserve untarnished the honor of the country; that no matter how splendid the material gain to the country by the ratification of the pending treaty, it will be too dearly bought when taken over as the result of a conspiracy on the part of our chief officers against the rights and sovereignty of a sister republic, to whom our guaranty of amity and justice is pledged by solemn treaty stipulations, as well as by the well-recognized requirements of common honesty.

This contention is supported by Senators on this side of the Chamber, whose great ability is recognized by everyone and whose sincerity all are bound to respect. Many of them are supporters of an isthmian canal project, and some of them earnest advocates of the Panama route. I entertain such respect for their judgment that unless I am clearly convinced that I should differ with them, I should deem it to be a duty and a matter of pleasure as well to bring myself into harmony with them. But I shall profit little by the splendid lessons of independence they have taught me here by expressing with fearlessness and earnestness the convictions under which they rest if I do not state with frankness the conclusions which my investigation of the matter has forced me to adopt. Such investigation and consideration as I have been able to give to the matter has not enabled me to reach the conclusion that I should oppose the ratification of the treaty on the grounds which have been stated in opposition to it.

I announce this conclusion with some diffidence, but without misgiving. In consequence of the character of the reasons urged in opposition to the treaty I have felt under the necessity of giving to the matter a more thorough examination than would otherwise have been thought necessary to the adoption of my course. This must account for the fact that I shall see proper to go over the matter in somewhat greater detail, covering many aspects of the case that have been so satisfactorily dealt with by others who have participated in the present debate. I have no confidence that I have succeeded in being able to point out the errors that I think lurk in the arguments of others, yet I have succeeded in impressing upon my mind a conviction that will not permit me to vote against this treaty as a means of emphasizing my opposition to the course pursued by the President.

I say, without hesitation, that if I had found myself convinced the secession and recognition of Panama to be the result of a conspiracy, expressly or impliedly formed, by the direction or with the connivance of the President, I should vote against the ratification of the treaty regardless of its merits. And at this point I take occasion to say that I do not find it to be necessary to commit myself to the approval of every act done by the present occupant of the White House since his term began before I can vote to ratify the Hay-Varilla treaty, nor does it follow that I should vote against ratification because I may disapprove of every other act of his Administration. My duty, and therefore my inquiry, is confined to this one matter and the aspect in which it comes to me for action. I say, as I have said, that I have been unable to bring myself to the belief that I should obstruct the consummation of an enterprise in which my State, in common with the entire country, is so vitally interested.

When I consider the whole facts of the transaction, its history and that of those who have been and who are now identified with it; find the President urged to action by the incitement of the great purpose to redeem the pledge of his Government to afford to the civilized world the benefits of an isthmian canal, and to gratify national pride by giving definite assurance of an early realization of a long-declared purpose to promote national interests and safety thereby; find him called upon to work out these results while smarting under a natural resentment at the perfidious and foolish conduct of Colombia—I can well understand how these impelling forces, operating on the impetuous and strenuous temperament of the man, might prompt him to do much that has subjected him to harsh criticism; but I am entirely content to say that in what he actually did he did not, in my opinion, so far transgress the boundaries of the power and discretion vested in him as to warrant me in repudiating his act by voting to reject the treaty.

To the well-informed and conservative observer of passing events, and of the persons, places, and things connected therewith, the wonder is not that he did so much to give free rein to the inherent spirit of revolution always rampant in Panama, but it rather excites wonder that he did so little in that direction. When the President comes to consider, in quiet retrospect, the events of the past three months, I do not doubt he will feel like exclaiming, as did Warren Hastings, who, when confronted with a catalogue of his irregularities in the Far East, said:

> When I contemplate the magnitude of my opportunities and the modesty of my performances I am struck with profound amazement at my unexampled moderation.

It will tend to a better understanding of the situation, and therefore of the environment in which they acted whose conduct has been so freely condemned here, to consider briefly the character of the people of Colombia with reference to their intelligence, moral responsibility, and civic pride; the character of government they maintain, and the kind of officers by which it is administered and the respect accorded to their acts by the people they assume to govern, and generally the sense of pride with which they support a contract or course of dealing which involves the national honor. As indicating the character of the Colombians and their rulers, I read an extract from the inaugural address of Vice-President Marroquin on taking the oath of office on August 7, 1898, after having overthrown and imprisoned President Sanclemente. He said:

> Hatred, envy, and greed cause men to differ in their opinions. In the political sphere where we struggle with earnestness, not so much in order to obtain a triumph of principles as we do for sinking or raising men and parties, public tranquillity, so essential in order that every citizen may enjoy in contentment the welfare which has been his lot to secure or which is the result of his labor, is becoming unknown among us. We live a sickly life; political crises are our normal condition; commerce and industry lack the peaceful condition which they require in order to advance. Poverty is knocking at all doors. * * *
> Our political disturbances have caused the conception of country to be annulled or mistaken. The idea which we have of country is associated in such manner to political revolts and with the fears and distrust engendered thereby that it is not an uncommon thing to hear from one of our countrymen what we would not hear from a native of any other country, viz, "I should like to have been born somewhere else."
> Are there many among us who pride themselves in saying, "I am a Colombian," as a Frenchman prides himself in saying, "I am a Frenchman"

In his message to the special session of Congress which convened on June 20, 1903, to consider the canal treaty, speaking in the same strain, he said:

> Politics, as this country has up to now considered the term, has nothing less than the furthering of personal interests at the expense of the public welfare.

He likewise congratulated himself upon the fact that all his efforts to obtain a loan abroad had resulted in failure, as this state of affairs left the revenues unburdened.

I have here an extract from an article which appeared in the September, 1902, number of the North American Review from E. A. Morales. That publication speaks of him as a prominent man, an able lawyer, and a native of Panama. He has just been made secretary of state under the junta, administering affairs in the Republic of Panama at this time. He says:

> Those who were for a just and honorable government styled themselves Historical Conservatives, while those in power appropriated the name of Nationalists, a vague appellation that has served to cover sudden and somewhat shameful transformations. * * *
> In 1897 the situation was still more grave and complicated. The Nationalist-Conservatives proclaimed as their candidate for the Presidency of the Republic Miguel A. Caro, the Vice-President, who had acted as President after the demise of Doctor Nunez, while the Historicals presented as their candidate Gen. Rafael Reyes, a politician of no definite tendency, who dared not even assume the aggressive attitude befitting the candidate of the opposition, and the Liberal party awaited events, ready either to give its support to the candidate who would bind himself to be a faithful upholder of the law and who would guarantee the effectiveness of its rights, or to proclaim a candidate of its own.
> Caro, after a silence that seemed to signify his acceptance of the candidature, performed an act of disinterestedness, which certainly no one in the country expected of him, by making himself ineligible according to the constitution, since he could not at the same time appear with the symbolical white mantle of the candidate and the staff of the magistrate, but he caused to be proclaimed instead the candidature of Dr. Manuel A. Sanclemente and Jose Manuel Marroquin for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency, respectively, and these were elected.
> Doctor Sanclemente was an old man of over 80, whose years rendered him unable to reside in the capital of the Republic, and from the moment that he was designated for the Presidency it was evident that the Government, sooner or later, must fall into the hands of Mr. Marroquin, and so it did. In the absence of Doctor Sanclemente, on the 7th of August, 1898, the Vice-President-elect took possession of the executive power. To the general surprise, Mr. Marroquin abandoned the Nationalist party, by which he had been elected, and declared himself an Historical. The Liberal party applauded acts which gave evidence of the firm resolve on the part of the Vice-President to place the country on the footing of a just, honorable, and moral régime that would have regard to the popular suffrage.
> But such a state of affairs could not be agreeable to those who had struggled, by fair means and foul, to perpetuate their hold on power, and before four months of the government of Mr. Marroquin had elasped the aged president was conducted to the capital to serve the purpose of supporting and safeguarding the Nationalist conservatives, who resumed the reins of government now more uncompromising than ever, since they had found themselves for several months dispossessed of what they had grown used to consider their property—the treasury. * * *
> Had Mr. Marroquin at that time refused to resign the government into the hands of Doctor Sanclemente, as the majority of the House of Representatives and many conspicuous men of his party counseled him to do, then the Republic of Colombia would not have become what it is to-day and what it has been for the last three years—an immense battlefield where the bones of thousands of its citizens lie bleaching in the sun, and where, from smoking ruins, there issues the haggard form of distress in the wretched garb of horror and dismay.

The civil war with which we are now afflicted is the consequence of that Nationalist reaction. The hopes that had been fostered by the Liberal party once frustrated, the tempest could not be held back. The leaders of the party exhorted their partisans to peace; but their exhortations were powerless to inspire confidence in the bosom of the great mass of those who had suffered in their rights and in their property; and toward the end of October, 1899, the bloody struggle of arms began. * * *

The war being in full sway, on the 31st of July, 1900, another revolution broke out, headed by Vice-President Marroquin and Gen. Manuel Casabianca, minister of war to the legitimate President, Doctor Sanclemente, which overthrew the latter with the support of the military garrisons and the people of the capital. Doctor Sanclemente was imprisoned and his post filled by the chief of the revolutionary movement, who, on his own authority and on the strength of the mutiny, declared himself better entitled to it.

One of the reasons adduced for the justification of the movement was a desire to terminate the war, assuming it to have been directed against Doctor Sanclemente and not against the régime of which he was the representative. * * *

In the meanwhile a vacuum was being formed around the Vice-President. With a few exceptions his fervent partisans left him, seeing that it was impossible to govern in the face of a revolution every day more powerful, and a legitimate President imprisoned a few leagues from Bogota, but alive and resolutely determined not to legally resign his authority into the hands of his persecutor and jailer.

That disruption in the rank and file of the political forces that had realized the movement of the 31st of July, 1900, seemed to pass unnoticed by the person most interested in interpreting the signs of the time. The vacancies in the ranks were filled by ignorant men of bad precedents, so that men have been seen to attain to the offices of ministers and governors who were not capable of filling the post of chief of police in the meanest village. That group of incapable and ignorant men are they who rule Colombia to-day.

Such has been the course of Colombia politics in the last eighteen years, and the actual situation may be summarized as follows:

A government de facto rules the country by the power of its bayonets, backed by no political party, for the Liberal party opposes it by force of arms, the Nationalist Conservative party repudiates it as the offspring of treachery, and the Historical Conservative party, in a state of dissolution, is only composed of the public officers and the military chiefs, for whom warfare is the most profitable of industries. * * *

Commerce, all industries, and even the very life of the nation were highly affected by this situation, as may be easily understood when it is known that one American dollar is equivalent to $50 in Colombian notes. * * *

I read again from an article which appeared in the North American Review for July, 1903, written by Raul Perez, a nephew of one of the former Presidents of Colombia, and himself a man of prominence in affairs until he was expelled by the Marroquin revolution. Under the heading "A Colombian view of the Panama Canal question," Raul Perez says:

Rascality is not the term that befits the character of the Colombian people. We Colombians are extremely unfortunate and unhappy, owing to the existence in our land of two bitterly contending parties, representing diametrically opposed views, with regard not only to government but the very conceptions of life. One is a mediæval, fanatical, and autocratic party, professing that the good of the people lies in complete ignorance and absolute submission to the church, with no other guide through the world but unlimited faith in the clergy. The other is a liberal, progressive, enlightened party, which believes that the people will not and can not obtain any rational degree of comfort and stability except through popular and universal education, and after securing some independence from the iron control of the clergy. * * *

The $10,000,000 that Colombia would receive as the only compensation is considered inadequate.

He was referring to the $10,000,000 proposed to be paid to Colombia under the terms of the Hay-Herran treaty, which was then pending before the Colombian Congress for ratification. He says:

The $10,000,000 that Colombia would receive as the only compensation is considered inadequate, and the same would be the case if the sum were increased to fifty millions. This may sound preposterous on first consideration, but not to those who know that the money would be distributed among the dictator's clique and the religious orders, that it would thus serve but to strengthen the fetters that already cut the Colombian flesh to the bone, and that posterity would only contemplate its heritage turned into deeper ignorance and more ignominious slavery in proportion to the larger amount received. * * *

The facts stated are perfectly well known to Colombians, who, from the time of Bolivar, have imagined that within the narrow strip linking the two American continents, Colombia held her great trump card. It would be an unspeakable disappointment to them to see that advantage fall into other hands, with no return but a few million dollars to be employed not for, but against, their welfare and prosperity. Indeed, so strong is this sentiment that it seems more patriotic to feel that no compensation at all would be preferable. There are many who maintain that a seizure of the Isthmus by a world power would be more satisfactory, inasmuch as Colombians would be in a position to repeat in all coming years the phrase: "Tout est perdu, fors l'honneur." The rights of Colombia in that case would hold good forever, and the day might come when they would be revindicated; but no such hope could be entertained if the dishonest band * * * who act as the Government of Colombia give a seemingly legal consent to the transaction.

The members of that band are in favor of the canal, not because they believe it to be of practical good to their country, and not because they have any love or admiration for the United States, but simply because they see the possibility of securing $10,000,000 to be applied to their own purposes. They argue more or less thus: "The Isthmus is a segregated limb of the country where we have not full sway. We may just as well abandon it in exchange for $10,000,000 with which to establish our uncontested dominion in the rest of the territory."

We are not required to form our opinion alone from what these Colombians say of their Government—its intelligence, integrity, and the motives which inspire its action—but we have the corroboration of one whose opportunities to observe and whose ability to state in clear and forceful terms what he saw can not be excelled. I refer to the Hon. William L. Scruggs, who for more than twenty-five years was our diplomatic representative at several of the governments in Central and South America. He has recorded his observations in a book, published a few years since in this country. He says that party conflicts, as they are understood in this country, are wholly unknown there; that the division among the people is not along lines where one party professes to be better able than another to administer the government in the interest of the people; but that strife is the result of a struggle between factions and leaders for the aggrandizement of the personal fortunes of those who affiliate for the time being and at the sacrifice of the public interests; that no thought of the public welfare enters into any of their contests, nor is it even pretended that such is the case.

He says that during the thirty years intervening from 1830 to 1861 there were five successive constitutions, all of which were successfully overthrown by revolutionary leaders who, in turn, took the existence of each one as a pretext for engaging in revolt; that these conflicts were so frequent that there were not two years of peace and tranquillity during the entire thirty years, and that during this period the maintenance of public order was exceptional, and that civil war was the rule; that the constitution of 1876 remained in force for twenty-two years before the book was written, and that during that time there were as many as eleven revolutions against the authority of those who exercised power under it.

Of course, under circumstances like these, there was no opportunity for the people to progress in the intelligence and virtue inseparable from good citizenship; their condition to-day is worse from every moral and material standpoint than that in which Cortez found them four hundred years ago.

Mr. Scruggs gives an account of how these numerous revolutions were organized and the means by which soldiers were enlisted to fight the battles that ensued. They usually came about in connection with the holding, or the declaration of the result, of an election, although they occurred many times when no election was pending. In speaking of those where the alleged pretext is the unfairness in which the election is held, he says:

The standing army consists of a few skeleton regiments of ill-paid privates and hordes of generals and other commissioned officers, who are invariably politicians. They may resign whenever they like, for others are always ready to take their places. To fill up the rank and file as emergencies arise the Government relies entirely upon impressments. Recruiting officers scour the country, lasso in hand, or lie in wait for the simple-minded aldeano at the market places, and catch peons very much in the same manner that a Texas herdsman lassoes his cattle. The "revolutionary" leader adopts the same method, and between the two the docile and simple-minded Indian rarely escapes. Once caught and put into the army, he knows only obedience. He is easily drilled and rarely fails to make a good soldier. He is stupidly indifferent to bodily danger, and will stand up and shoot and be shot at without flinching. If taken prisoner he is at once enlisted in the ranks of his captors, and will fight quite as well there as he did on the other side. If he is killed while on the winning side some show of provision is usually made for his family. If he falls while fighting on the losing side his family are expected to make no complaint. If he survives the strife he returns, unpaid and half naked, but quietly and peaceably, to his humble home, never seeming to realize that he has been badly treated. Almost any other human being in any other country would, under like circumstances, become an outlaw and a desperado, but the native Indian of the Andes accepts his hard lot without even an audible murmur.

Lieutenant-Commander Culver, of the war ship Bancroft, in a communication to the Secretary of the Navy, dated Colon, December 13, 1902, says, among other things, of these Colombian soldiers:

The Government forces are being slowly disbanded. Forty per cent of them are boys from 9 to 15 years of age. They are stationed at various posts along the route of the railroad, are filthy in person and dress and poorly clad, and appear like a rabble of children.

I have presented this recital of conditions in Colombia with no desire to be offensive to a people who are so unfortunately situated, but for the purpose of showing the kind of people who constitute that Republic, and who create its public opinion, thus affording some idea of the extent to which a moral obligation would be deemed binding upon them in compelling compliance in good faith with an undertaking assumed on their behalf. We may then more fairly and justly estimate the conduct of those who have dealt with them in a manner somewhat more arbitrary than would be justified under other and different conditions. The circumstances of every particular case fix its character as being right or wrong. What would be a proper negotiation, or a proper detail of a negotiation, with one of the greater governments of the earth, where reciprocal good faith is assured in advance, would not fit a condition made up by people and politicians such as are there described by evidence that never has been contradicted and never can be.

I am not to be understood by this as saying that we should appropriate to ourselves, or by guilty complicity assist others to appropriate, that which rightfully belongs to another, however wanting in honesty and intelligence that other may be. Our Government owes it to our own people to treat everyone justly, and this not because we fear penalties for failing to do so, but because of the comfort that comes from the sense of having done right for its sake alone.

But in the important negotiations which she is required to conduct in carrying out the great purposes for which this Government was instituted among men she has a right to insist that those with whom she deals shall not make a mockery of her efforts by a course of duplicity and trifling. In her negotiations with Colombia she was not dealing with a commercial adversary who had the right to be independent to the extent of being whimsical.

For a proper understanding of the relations between the United States and Colombia it is necessary to advert to a few well-known historical facts. These will indicate that at the time the Hay-Herran treaty was rejected by the Colombian Congress, in August, 1903, matters had progressed too far for Colombia to claim an unrestricted discretion in dealing with the matter. By a long course of dealing and acquiescence the so-called sovereignty of Colombia had been diminished in the interests of her continued existence. For eighty years we have protected the Western Hemisphere from European aggression by what is known as the Monroe doctrine. Under this doctrine we declare and maintain that any attempt on the part of European governments to extend their systems to any part of this hemisphere will be dangerous to our peace and safety.

Colombia, in common with the other Central and South American States, has been permitted to enjoy the immunities from foreign aggressions which this doctrine afforded them. But for this declared policy the continued revolutions and conflicts in Colombia would long since have passed her into the control of some one of the European governments. So jealous have we been of the Monroe doctrine that we have declared the project to build an isthmian canal by any foreign government to be within its scope. When the old Panama Canal Company became insolvent, and it was evident that the project was too gigantic for any private company to undertake in that revolutionary and disturbed section of the world, the French Government, our traditional friend, concluded to take up the project and complete it, in the hope of saving something for her citizens, who had invested and lost so much of their money. While the matter was under discussion in the French Assembly, the United States Senate, by a vote of 49 to 3, on January 7, 1889, passed the following concurrent resolution:

That the Government of the United States will look with serious concern and disapproval upon any connection of any European Government with the construction or control of any ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien or across Central America, and must regard such connection or control as injurious to the just rights and interests of the United States and as a menace to their welfare.

SEC. 2. That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate this expression of the views of the Government of the United States to the governments of the countries of Europe.

This resolution went to the House of Representatives and was reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs without amendment. It was accompanied by a report which the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate, in the Fifty-sixth Congress, designated as a very learned and able report by Mr. MCCREARY, of Kentucky, now an honored member of this Senate, on March 2, 1889, too late for consideration at that session of Congress.

This resolution declared it to be a corollary to the Monroe doctrine that the construction of an isthmian canal was an enterprise of a character and magnitude governmental in many of its aspects, and that it should not be constructed under the ownership, patronage, and control of any foreign government, for it was known that sooner or later the armament necessary to protect it would become a menace to our peace and welfare in this hemisphere.

In 1846 the United States authorized our representative at the Colombian capital to open up negotiations with a view to relieving the commerce of the United States of certain onerous and discriminating duties levied upon our products sold in the Colombian markets. The Colombian authorities, while assenting to this, made it a condition that that Government should be permitted to dedicate the Isthmus to a perfect neutrality, and required the United States to become the guarantor thereof. That after having carved out of the sovereignty of Colombia over the Isthmus this estate of absolute neutrality, she required the United States to guarantee the residuum of her sovereignty therein.

In the exposition of motives which the Colombian representative transmitted to our State Department it was stated that this course was necessary because of the aggression manifested by Great Britain on the Atlantic coast, citing the fact that she had already acquired control over numerous places that would enable her to enjoy advantages at the expense of the United States and other Governments seeking to carry on commerce to the south of us. This treaty was entered into by our Government; and for more than fifty years we have extended to Colombia the protection that it contemplated. It is not pretended by anyone that this treaty required the United States Government to protect the sovereignty of Colombia as against the insurrections carried on by her own citizens. As a result of all these declarations of purpose on our part, and contracts entered into with Colombia, the latter was shorn of many of the attributes of sovereignty as we understand that term when it is applied to England, France, or others of the great governments of the world. To the extent that Colombia lost it we gained it, and it amounted to a definite interest in the Isthmus.

Colombia's attitude thereafter was that of the owner of an article of property that was hers only in the sense that she was entitled to receive its value when disposed of, and that, in selling it, she should not be required to surrender her incidental governmental rights further than was necessary to vest the purchaser with the title and control necessary to make the purchase effective. This left the situation where Colombia might utilize the Isthmus for canal purposes by constructing the canal herself or by authorizing a private corporation to do so. It goes without saying that Colombia is wholly without the resources to do so on her own account, and experience demonstrates the fact that available private enterprise and capital are wholly inadequate to the accomplishment of the purpose. The undertaking was of such magnitude and the locality in which it was to be carried on presented so many natural and political difficulties that the unlimited credit and authoritative powers of a great government were necessary in its accomplishment and successful operation.

Under conditions evolved by the past fifty years that government is necessarily the United States. Prior to 1902 the discussions in this country assumed that in consequence of the contracts between Colombia and the French canal company that the Panama route was not to be taken into consideration in any effort that the United States might make to build a canal on her own account, and because of this the discussions related almost entirely to the advantages and disadvantages of the Nicaragua route. In 1898 a very formidable revolution broke out in Colombia, said to have been due largely to the fact that President Sanclemente had made an unauthorized extension of ten years to the Panama Canal Company. This revolution made such progress that in the year 1902 it was plainly evident that the Departments of Panama, Cauca, and Bolivar were quite likely to be able to maintain themselves as an independent republic. This is shown by the following letters from Admiral Casey, who was in charge of our forces sent to the Isthmus to protect the transit granted to our citizens and commerce under the treaty of 1846. I will read from a note written by the Admiral, dated on the 13th of October, 1902.

I inclose a clipping from the Panama Star and Herald of October 12, 1902. In this connection I take occasion to inform the Department that I have refrained, as far as possible, from in any way embarrassing the officials of the Colombian Government, except so far as is absolutely necessary in my judgment to maintain uninterrupted and unembarrassed transit and to prevent the line of transit from being converted into a theater of hostilities. I shall decide such questions as the conditions may change from day to day, and when in doubt will consult the Department.

Further, in this connection, I have to inform the Department that I have been unable to learn of any effort on the part of the Colombian Government to crush the revolution in this district just prior to or since my arrival at Panama. On the other hand, it is my opinion that if it were not for the restraining influence of our naval force here Panama would fall an easy victim to the combined land forces and gunboats of the insurgents.

Again, on the 20th of October he wrote the following in a letter to the Secretary of the Navy:

Judging from conditions now existing and from information I am able to obtain, there seems little prospect of a speedy termination of this strife. Panama and Colon are practically besieged.

That was on October 20. They were practically besieged by Herrara and his forces.

Troops at neither place dare to go beyond their intrenchments.

They had Colombia hemmed in until her troops did not dare go beyond the trenches.

I firmly believe if our men were removed from shore the insurgents would be in Panama in forty-eight hours. I think the Government therefore is very willing that they should remain, making occasional mild objections which, really, it does not mean shall be taken seriously.

Great things were expected on Perdomo's arrival; but as he came attended only by numerous generals, of which there were apparently already a surfeit in the city, I fail to see how he can accomplish much.

In 1902 it became evident that the New Panama Canal Company never could complete the canal it had undertaken, principally because it was impossible to raise the money in the open market for carrying on an enterprise which was not only not protected, but which was continually obstructed by the Government of the country in which it was located. Colombia realized about the same time that her only chance to suppress the revolution and save her boundaries from dismemberment was to interest the United States in the Panama route. For this purpose her minister of war, Mr. Concha, was sent here nominally to take charge of the legation during the temporary absence of the regular minister, but really to cooperate with Cromwell, the attorney of the New Panama Canal Company, in the negotiation of a contract that would put an end to the revolution and at the same time enable the New Panama Canal Company to find a purchaser for its property and franchises, and thus rescue the latter from the complete annihilation threatened by the adoption by the United States of the Nicaragua route, which had become imminent by the passage of what is known as the "Hepburn bill" by the House of Representatives, providing for the construction of the canal on this latter route.

As a result of the efforts of Mr. Concha and others, which Mr.

Hay, Secretary of State, says were pressed for more than a year, on the 22d of April, 1902, the form of a treaty was entered into and signed on behalf of the respective Governments, by which the New Panama Canal Company was authorized to sell to the United States its rights and property, and the Government of Colombia agreed to accept from the United States $7,000,000 for the grants and franchises necessary for the construction and operation of the canal. An additional annuity was provided for in the contract signed, but the amount of this was to be determined on the basis of the profit derived from the operation of the canal, to be definitely fixed by arbitration.

In a communication sent by Concha after the protocol had been signed, he perpetrates the following act of characteristic Colombian disingenuousness, which becomes palpable when we recall that the sum of $10,000,000 was demanded a few months later for the very same grants and franchises then being offered for $7,000,000:

> Colombia has no lust of unjust gain through the construction of the canal in her territory, and a final convention on this subject will not be hampered by pecuniary considerations. Her pride in the matter is bent on having the neutral waterway between the two oceans, that ideal of universal peace and progress, become a reality on her territory and under the protection of her sovereignty. The compensations asked by Colombia have special importance only in that they will imply a practical and constant recognition of her sovereignty.

This Hay-Concha protocol was to become operative as a treaty as soon as our Government should authorize its execution on our part. This was done on June 28, 1902, by the passage of what is known as the "Spooner law," by the provisions of which the President of the United States was authorized to acquire from the Republic of Colombia a strip of land not less than 6 miles in width, over which the canal was to be constructed, provided this territory could be acquired within a reasonable time, and if not, then negotiations were to be entered into with Nicaragua and Costa Rica looking to the construction of the canal on what is known as the "Nicaragua route." The Colombian Government pretended that it was not possible to assemble its Congress for the ratification of the Hay-Concha treaty as long as the revolution was in progress, and because of this the good offices of the United States, aiding to suppress the rebellion on a pretext of protecting the Isthmus, were invoked, as will be seen from the following letter received by our State Department:

> SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington:
> Minister for foreign affairs desires me to inform you that his Government would appreciate your good offices to bring about peace in the country, especially on the Isthmus, where the revolution is strong. This Government has no new terms to offer, but thinks your good offices may avail to induce revolutionists to accept terms heretofore offered, and thus prevent otherwise inevitable heavy loss of life.

At that time this Hay-Concha protocol had been signed and was pending.

> Minister for foreign affairs added: Not only is the question of humanity involved, but so long as the war lasts Congress will not be convened, and therefore the continuance of war will delay submission of the canal matter to Congress.
> Minister for foreign affairs emphasized this last point as being well to present to your consideration.
> HART.

As a result of the intervention of the United States, on the 21st of November, 1902, the revolution, under the leadership of General Herrera, collapsed just at a time when it was evident that no resistance that Colombia could interpose would prevent its triumph and the establishment of a new republic composed of Panama, Cauca, and Bolivar. The chief cause of the Herrera outbreak was the dissatisfaction in Panama because of the dishonest juggling by the Colombian Government with the canal interests. It was evident to the Panamaians that all hope of having the canal constructed in their territory was about to become hopeless, notwithstanding the superiority of the route, by the United States being forced to adopt the Nicaragua route. Herrera, in his letter to Admiral Casey, speaks of the canal question as being condensed into a national interest, one of the most vital to the life and prosperity of Panama. The very first stipulation in the treaty or compact entered into between the Colombian Government and Herrera for the termination of the revolution provided that the Congress of Colombia would at once take up and consider and dispose of the mattter of constructing the canal.

The dishonest and perfidious politicians who constituted the Government at Bogota had thus succeeded in putting down the revolution by aid secured on the promise to close the negotiations for the canal site on the basis of the Hay-Concha treaty, and then finding that the United States had committed itself in a statute to the primary adoption of the Panama route and had, therefore, broken off all pending negotiations with Costa Rica and Nicaragua, repudiated the act of Concha in entering into the treaty and demanded that the terms of a new convention should be agreed upon. Our Government reluctantly acceded to this, and, on the 22d day of January, 1903, what is known as the "Hay-Herran treaty" was signed by the representatives, respectively, of Colombia and the United States.

Under the terms of this treaty the amount to be paid to Colombia was, without explanation, required to be increased from $7,000,000 to $10,000,000, and the annuity fixed at $250,000 a year, with the right of readjustment at every period of one hundred years. Other provisions were incorporated in the treaty, deemed by many to be unfair to the very limit of toleration to the United States Government. But so great was the anxiety on the part of Congress and the people to see actual work begin on the great enterprise that the treaty was ratified by our Government, notwithstanding the palpable imposition practiced by Colombia.

In the regular course the treaty was now transmitted to Bogota for ratification by the Colombian Congress. It is admitted by everyone that the treaty is more than fair to Colombia, both in the amounts that were agreed to be paid and in the concession of territorial rights to the United States. Not only is this the case, but every well-informed man knows that the sum of money stipulated to be paid was in excess of the value of the franchise, taking into account the great amount of money necessary to be invested to make the franchise effective and the problematical character of the volume of business necessary to make the project a self-sustaining one; while the rights of occupancy reserved were scarcely in excess of those which the landlord concedes to a tenant on a tract of his land. But, in addition to these material advantages the treaty secured to Colombia, its fair treatment by her was made a matter of duty by the sentimental relation growing out of dealings between the two countries for the past sixty years.

Therefore, in the acts of duplicity and unfairness manifested by Colombia in connection with the consideration and rejection of the treaty could only be taken as an act of cupidity, encouraged by the dishonest spirit which blinded its authors to the extent of their own rights and the natural and imminent character of their dangers. Even before the assembling of the Congress which was to consider the treaty a systematic scheme of blackmail and oppression was developed both as against the interest of the New Canal Company and that of the United States by the politicians of Colombia. As evidencing this fact, and as well showing the attitude of the representatives of Panama in threatening to secede in the event the treaty was not ratified, I make the following somewhat extended quotation from the official correspondence between our diplomatic agents in Colombia and our State Department.

It appears from the communication from Minister Beaupré, on April 7, 1903, after the treaty had been ratified by the United States Senate, but before the Colombian Government was notified of the fact officially, that the Bogota authorities had informed the railway and canal companies that it would be necessary to appoint agents to negotiate terms upon which these companies would be allowed to sell and transfer their property and concessions, as provided for in the first article of the treaty.

This is the first evidence of bad faith, since the very purpose of the first article of the treaty was to enable these companies to do the very thing that it was now sought to deny to them by these proposed negotiations.

The following extracts from the correspondence between Minister Beaupré and the State Department will show the duplicity and perfidy which characterized the manner of the Bogota Government in dealing with the ratification of the treaty:

Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay.

APRIL 15, 1903.

> The financial crisis had, previous to this announcement, reached a most acute stage, and the only feeling expressed was that of relief at the prospect of receiving $10,000,000, which was then considered sufficient to put in reasonably good condition the finances of the country. I am convinced I am right in saying that the public had never expected better terms. The proof is that when the news of the signing of the convention came foreign exchange ran down from 10,000 per cent to 6,300 per cent, and when it was rumored that the United States Senate had refused its assent a panic immediately ensued on the market, and exchange at once rose again to over 10,000 per cent.
> This was the state of affairs until General Fernandez, the minister of government in charge of the ministry of finance, issued a circular to the Bogota press (which had suddenly sprung into existence), inviting discussion on the canal convention. The circular was to the effect that the Government had no preconceived wishes for or against the measure—

He was minister of finance under Marroquin's administration, the administration that had negotiated this treaty on behalf of Colombia—> that it was for Congress to decide, and Congress would be largely guided by public opinion. At the same time what purported to be a translation of the text of the convention was published.

> Since then a complete revolution in feeling has taken place. From approbation to suspicion and from suspicion to decided opposition have been the phases of change in public sentiment during the last month.
>
> As, for instance, I may mention that one of the most widely read of the newspapers states, and brings forward a whole collection of figures in support of its statement, that on the initial deal alone the United States starts with a clear profit of $180,000,000. Absurd as such statements are, they voice the opinions and convictions of the Bogota public.
> * * * * * * *

This, then, is the present state of affairs. As to what will happen it is impossible to predict; yet this much seems certain to me: If it is the wish of the Government that the convention be ratified, it will be done.

Mr. Hay to Mr. Beaupré.

APRIL 28, 1903.

Secretary of State, again referring to the announced purpose of Colombia to disregard the authority given to the railway and canal companies to assign to the United States their franchises and convey their property, said:

"Passing for the moment the terms of the treaty by which consent is given, the consent of the Colombian Government to the proposed sale has been given so repeatedly and in so many different ways, and has been so frequently and officially brought to the notice of this Government by the ministers plenipotentiary of Colombia, duly accredited to the United States, as to make it impossible for the executive government of that Republic to retract it. The entire action of this Government upon the subject has been taken in reliance upon these official assurances of the consent of Colombia, and any withdrawal or qualification of that consent would be wholly inconsistent with such assurances.

"The Government of Colombia initiated the negotiations, and it can not be conceived that it would now disclaim its own propositions, nor can this Government acquiesce in such a course.

"It is further to be noted that the Republic of Colombia is the second largest shareholder in the New Panama Canal Company. At the meeting of the shareholders of this company held on December 21, 1901, at which the board of directors was authorized to make the proposal of sale to the United States which has been accepted, the Republic was represented by M. Uribe, her consul-general at Paris, specially credited for that purpose, who was one of the officers of the meeting and voted the shares of Colombia in favor of the sale. Similarly, at the meeting of the board of directors of the company on December 23, 1901, M. Samper, the representative of the Colombian Government on the board, voted in favor of the sale."

Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay.

MAY 4, 1903.

Mr. Mancini, the representative of the French canal company at the capital, says that he is emphatically of the opinion that the Congress will refuse to ratify the convention and that he has written to his company to that effect. He also said that while there was a moral obligation clearly upon the Government to defend a contract of its own making, it had not done so and evidently did not intend to do so. It is entirely impossible to convince these people that the Nicaragua route was ever seriously considered by the United States, that the negotiations concerning it had any other motive than the squeezing of an advantageous bargain out of Colombia, nor that any other than the Panama route ever will be selected. Therefore it is contended, and generally believed, that there is no immediate necessity of confirming the Hay-Herran convention; that the negotiations can be safely prolonged, in the end securing very much better terms for Colombia.

The public discussion is largely along the lines of the loss of the national honor by the surrender of sovereignty.

Private discussion, which perhaps more clearly reflects the real situation, is to the effect that the price is inadequate; that a much greater sum of money can be obtained, and that the United States can be obligated to guarantee the sovereignty of Colombian ports outside the Department of Panama against the invasion or seizure by foreign enemies. The one great determining point, however, is the belief that the price can be greatly augmented.

Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay.

MAY 7, 1903.

The probabilities are that when the measure is presented to Congress there will be a lengthy debate and an adverse vote. Then the representatives of the coast Departments of the Cauca, Panama, and Bolivar will ask for a reconsideration and urge a ratification of the convention as the only means of preventing the secession of those Departments and the attempt to constitute of their territories an independent republic. The debate will be resumed and in the end the friends of the Government and of confirmation will prevail.

There was constant warning by our State Department that good faith in dealing with the treaty was expected at the hands of the executive department of the Colombian Government.

In a communication dated the 9th of June, 1903, Mr. Hay says:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 9, 1903.

The Colombian Government apparently does not appreciate the gravity of the situation. The canal negotiations were initiated by Colombia, and were energetically pressed upon this Government for several years. The propositions presented by Colombia, with slight modifications, were finally accepted by us. In virtue of this agreement our Congress reversed its previous judgment and decided upon the Panama route. If Colombia should now reject the treaty or unduly delay its ratification, the friendly understanding between the two countries would be so seriously compromised that action might be taken by the Congress next winter which every friend of Colombia would regret. Confidential. Communicate substance of this verbally to the minister of foreign affairs. If he desires it, give him a copy in form of memorandum.

HAY.

Beaupré to Hay.

JUNE 10, 1903.

Mr. Mancini, the local agent of the Panama Canal Company, has informed me that he had received an official note from the Colombian Government, stating that it did not think that the convention would be ratified because of the opinion that the compensation was insufficient, but that if the canal company would pay to Colombia about $10,000,000 ratification could be secured.

Congress had been called to meet June 20, 1903.

Beaupré to Hay.

JUNE 23, 1903.

Confidential. Friends of the Government have control in Congress. I believe no legislation seriously desired by the Government will pass.

Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay.

JUNE 25, 1903.

Opposition Chamber of Representatives opened canal discussion yesterday, demanding documents relating to the treaty. The Government objected because it was not ready to present the treaty. The Government was sustained—vote 38 to 5.

President Marroquin in his message to Congress June 20, 1903, after adverting in an unconcerned way to the arguments advanced for and against the ratification of the treaty, said:

Happily for me the immense responsibility of coming to a decision falls to Congress. That is the body which has to give its approbation or disapprobation of the agreement proposed by the Government of the United States.

The minister for foreign affairs will lay before you the subject of a convention proposed by the Government of the United States of America, set forth the antecedents thereof, and give such explanations as may seem interesting in connection with the canal.

I think it unnecessary to state that since I have thrown upon you all the responsibility that the decision of this negotiation brings, it is not my intention to allow my opinion to weigh in the matter. Whenever I have transmitted instructions to our representatives in Washington I have directed them to formally express my resolution to submit the study and decision of this most serious affair, in its general sense and its details, to the supreme Congress.

Indeed, it has been one of our indisputable diplomatic triumphs that the Senate and Executive of the United States, in spite of the strong efforts made to the contrary, declared the superiority of the Colombian route.

The President, who had used every art of diplomacy for several years to induce this Government to enter into a convention with his Government to take off the hands of a bankrupted company a project to build a canal in its territory; who had pledged, directly and indirectly, in every way open to him to pledge, to this Government good faith, and thereafter got his consent to send that message to his Congress, either rested under some force that was intimidating him into a false position or was unfit to be trusted in any negotiation where honorable men were called on to act.

Beaupré to Hay.

JULY 5, 1903.

Your telegram construed by many as a threat of direct retaliation against Colombia in case the treaty is not ratified. This, and the statement of just-arrived members of Congress from Panama that this Department would revolt if the treaty is not ratified, caused alarm, and the effect is favorable.

The very first thing that the senators and representatives from the Department of Panama said when they came to Bogota to attend the special session of Congress to which this treaty was to be submitted for ratification was, "If you do not ratify the treaty this time, we will secede." Their purpose to secede became a matter that they did not seek to conceal.

Beaupré to Hay.

JULY 9, 1903.

Prominent politicians had indicated before treaty could be passed two amendments must be made, namely, stipulating the payment of $10,000,000 by canal company for the right to transfer and $15,000,000 by the United States Government.

Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay.

JULY 11, 1903.

Minister says that opposition to Government raises the point that the acting President should sign the treaty before it can be considered by the Senate.

Debate on this question has been going on for many days, and the end is not yet.

Ex-President Caro has been the leader of the opposition in the debate and has made many brilliant speeches. He has charged the Government with lack of good faith and consistency, both to the United States and Colombia, in not defending a treaty of its own making and for endeavoring to throw the whole responsibility upon Congress.

The theory of the discussion is to the effect that if the Vice-President signs the treaty the entire responsibility for its making rests with the Executive power, while if the Vice-President does not sign, and the treaty is either ratified or rejected, no responsibility can attach to the Executive.

The Vice-President (Marroquin) has positively declined to sign, and if the motion as presented should prevail, and he still refuses his signature, the Senate will not consider the treaty at all, and in all probability the Congress will be dissolved.

He absolutely refused to sign the treaty, to perform the perfunctory act of signing his name to a treaty, and to that extent to lend his indorsement to it, notwithstanding that he had conducted negotiations to that end for several years.

Mr. SPOONER. And after he had directed his diplomatic representative here to sign it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly. He had furnished him with the full authority usually given diplomatic agents to make treaties. It was exhibited to the other contracting party at the time the negotiations were entered upon.

If one could know just what would be the attitude of the Government later on, it would be easy enough to predict the outcome, for I still adhere to my oft-repeated opinion that if the Government shall seriously desire it the treaty will be ratified. Its present attitude of washing its hands of the whole matter will not do, for while the House is favorable, there is a declared majority in the Senate against ratification, and only the influence of the Government can win it over.

Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay.

JULY 21, 1903.

It has been most difficult to overcome the at one time almost general belief that the United States did not seriously intend to adopt the Nicaragua route should this Congress fail to ratify the treaty and to make it understood that the great benefit Colombia expected to realize from the construction of the canal depended upon prompt action and could never be secured by future diplomatic negotiatons.

In this same dispatch the minister informs the State Department that one of the prominent members of the committee of the Senate having in charge the consideration of the treaty applied to the German chargé d'affaires, to inquire the attitude of the German Government in case of trouble arising out of the matter, and whether it would be willing to undertake to aid the construction of the canal.

It seems a similar application was made by others to the representative of the British Government. Neither of these diplomatic representatives gave any encouragement to such a suggestion.

Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay.

AUGUST 5, 1903.

It is now apparent that the treaty will not be ratified without amendment, because the positive influence on the part of this Government can not be expected.

Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay.

AUGUST 12, 1903.

The treaty was rejected by the Senate to-day in its entirety. Confidential. Do not accept this as final. There is still some hope.

On the same day the minister said he was advised by —— —— the action of Congress was in accordance with plans effected by the Government and influential Senators and citizens in the belief that the treaty could be passed without amendments, but that within a short time he believed a reaction of public sentiment would enable the President to present the treaty again to the Senate and secure its passage without amendments.

Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay.

AUGUST 15, 1903.

As I have on many occasions informed you, ratification has seemed almost hopeless from the beginning without the active influence of the Government, and this it has never used. The Nationalists, under the lead of Senator Caro, have been too deeply concerned in their efforts to belittle the Government to consider the merits of the treaty at all. The Liberals, while not represented in Congress, are the most active factors in creating public opinion, and have taken an almost identical position. The coffee planters and exporters, who think their business would be ruined by low foreign exchange, have been unpatriotic enough to place personal interests above national good, and have been against the treaty because, the $10,000,000 once paid, Colombia would send exchange so low that coffee could not be exported from the interior. Even the Panama representatives have lately become so thoroughly imbued with the idea of an independent republic that they have been more or less indifferent to the fate of the treaty.

Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay.

AUGUST 18, 1903.

There is a feverish anxiety here to know what your position will be upon receiving news of the rejection of the treaty and further action by Congress upon it.

Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Bogota, August 31, 1903. (Received September 5.)

August 31, 1903, 2 p. m. I had an interview with Senator Ospina to-day. He informed me that he is willing to remain so long as there is hope for the treaty, but he is convinced that there is none, and will leave, therefore, on the 6th proximo.

Confirms General Reyes's statement concerning presidential candidate, and says that the next Senate was made certain for the treaty; that he bears instructions to Governors Signares and Barrios concerning the elections which will be held next December; that in accepting the governorship of Panama he told the President that in case the Department found it necessary to revolt to secure canal he would stand by Panama; but he added if the Government of the United States will wait for the next session of Congress canal can be secured without a revolution. Senator Campo, from the Cauca, is about to leave, thinking the treaty gone.

Confidential. My opinion is that nothing satisfactory can be expected from this Congress. Caro's party has been joined by Velez and Soto and their followers, constituting a decisive majority against the treaty. General Reyes seems to still entertain hopes.

BEAUPRÉ.

Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, September 11, 1903.

SIR: I have the honor to report that events of interest have taken place in connection with the appointment of Senator Obaldia to the post of governor of the Department of Panama.

Senator Obaldia's separatist tendencies are well known, and he is reported to have said that, should the canal treaty not pass, the Department of Panama would declare its independence, and would be right in doing so. That these are his opinions there is, of course, no doubt, as I stated in my telegram to the Department of August 31, 1903.

At yesterday's session of the Senate the feeling of opposition to Señor Obaldia's appointment was given expression by a resolution proposed by Senator Perez y Soto, to the effect that—

"The Senate of the Republic can not see with indifference the appointment which has been made for the post of governor of the Department of Panama, which it regards as a menace to the safety of the Republic."

This resolution was amended by omitting the reference to the governorship of Panama in particular, and made to include all administrative posts held under the Government.

In this form it passed with an almost unanimous vote.

Publicly avowed on the floor of the Senate and discussed in connection with the resolution calling attention to it, his appointment was perfectly well known to be the first step in a revolution if the canal treaty was not adopted. It was a settled and defined policy, in the declaration of which no sort of secrecy was practiced. It was stated upon the floor of the Senate; it was made the subject of a resolution and a vote there, and yet there are those who pretend to believe that it was instigated at a later day and elsewhere.

Panama had the right of revolution, and we did not confer it upon her, although we had frequently prevented her successful resort to it. We had the right of recognition, and we are not compelled to account to Colombia for the manner in which we exercised it.

The debate itself, though short, for it lasted under two hours, was one of the most important that has yet taken place in open session. As I telegraphed yesterday, it was nothing more or less than a direct vote of censure.

It was said that Obaldia's appointment could have one, and only one, explanation: That he was sent to the Isthmus to make necessary preparations for the presidential election—

Reyes was the candidate of the party with which Obaldia affiliated—and that other similar appointments had been made with the same end in view—such as that of insignares to the Department of Bolivar.

The speakers showed greater heat than I have yet known them to evince in this Congress. It seemed to be the general opinion that the Government was prostituting the general interests of the country for purposes of electioneering intrigue.

Gen. Pedro Nel Ospina, in a passionate and much applauded speech, warned the Government that should it persist in its present course, exhausted as the country was, a fresh revolution was not far distant.

The notable feature in the debate was the general spirit of hostility shown toward the Government, both by the senators themselves and by the public assembled in the gallery and round the lobbies. With the exception of one senator there was not a speaker who did not bitterly and uncompromisingly denounce the Government. When Senator Marroquin, the son of the President, rose to defend the action of the Government, he was greeted with hisses from all parts of the house, and hisses and jeers accompanied him throughout his speech. There was absolutely no sympathy for him nor for his position.

It is evident, I think, that a cross current was at work during the debate. It was initiated by an opponent of the canal and a believer in the integrity of Colombia against the appointment of a Panamaian who ardently supported the canal, and who, if forced to accept an alternative, would rather see the Isthmus independent than lose the chance of seeing the canal built through his Department. The opponent of the canal scheme carried the house with him, but he gained their support not in virtue of his attitude on the canal question, but because his resolution opened the door to a general attack on the Government.

Here is another:

BOGOTA, October 21, 1903.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that there is no disguising the alarm existing as to the possible action of the Government of the United States should the feeling of disaffection undoubtedly existing in the Department of Panama find expression in overt acts. This alarm took the form of a heated debate in the Senate yesterday, when the Government was again attacked for the appointment of Señor Obaldia as governor of Panama. The reply elicited from the minister for foreign affairs was rather significant. He read an extract from the treaty of 1846, in which the United States guaranteed Colombian sovereignty on the Isthmus, and assured the Senate that in case of an insurrection in the Department of Panama the United States would be bound to support the Government.

In the course of this debate Señor Caro said that the minister for foreign affairs had the notes of the American minister read to the Senate, in secret session, with the object of convincing that body of the necessity of accepting the Hay-Herran treaty, in view of the menacing attitude outlined in those communications. Finding in that secret session that the Senate disapproved the treaty and was determined to act accordingly, the Government, through Senator Lorenzo Marroquin, its spokesman, obtained a resolution demanding that those notes be read in public session, with the object of making it appear that the rejection of the treaty was influenced by a sentiment of indignation at the threatening attitude assumed by the United States minister.

They began to manufacture a false public opinion there by seeking to make it appear that the Senate resented the implied threat contained in some of the correspondence from Washington and that this was the ground on which they rejected the treaty.

This comedy became known to the Government of the United States, and it has resented it. He was not influenced, generally, by what was reported in the newspapers, but the statement universally given expression to in the press of the United States that the Washington Government resented the criticism made against the United States minister in carrying out the orders emanating both from the President and Secretary Hay can not be without foundation. This was only one instance proving that the Colombian Government had not acted in good faith in these negotiations. The refusal on the part of President Marroquin to sign the treaty before presenting it to the Senate was another.

Whatever reasons the Government adduced as to there being no necessity for such a signature was outside the point. The intention was clear that the treaty was not signed because the Government wanted to have a loophole whereby to escape their obligations to the United States. In other words, it did not want to be under the obligation of coming forward to defend and support a treaty which was signed by its order. It was bound in good faith to the United States to do so. It was for Congress alone to accept or reject it. Had such a course been followed there would have been no reason to look forward with alarm to the attitude which the United States might adopt. The Colombian Government had nothing to fear from the United States had it clearly done all in its power in supporting the treaty. No responsibility would then have have attached to this country for the rejection of the treaty by Congress, a body which had the perfect right to reject or accept as it pleased. What he feared was that the United States might take the Isthmus from us under the just plea that we had acted in bad faith with them.

And he uttered a statement which ought to be emblazoned in golden letters on the walls of that Senate:

The only strength which a small nation has is its good faith.

* * * * * * * *

An effort was made by the Government to falsely place the blame for the rejection of the Hay-Herran treaty upon the notes addressed by this legation to the minister for foreign affairs, and the result was awaited in the belief that this view would be accepted by the Government of the United States. This attempt failed; the situation is disturbing; and now the further delay is, quite apparently, for the purpose of awaiting the action of President Roosevelt in his message to the special session of our Congress which is to meet, it is understood here, on the 9th proximo, and the attitude of that Congress upon receiving the President's message. (Mr. Beaupré to Mr. Hay, November 2, 1903.)

Senator Caro, in the course of an impassioned speech in the Senate arraigning the Marroquin government, said:

The second great error committed by the Government was the appointment of Señor Obaldia to the governorship of the Department of Panama.

The election of General Reyes to the presidency of Colombia meant the election of a Congress next year pledged to pass whatever canal treaty the Government should present. Señor Obaldia was therefore a supporter of the candidacy of General Reyes, and it was for this reason that he was appointed governor of the Isthmus. But Señor Obaldia was before all an Isthmanian, and he was known to have said that should the Department rise in favor of the canal he would be with Panama. Therefore the Government had for electioneering purposes endangered their possession of the Isthmus. He read to the Senate an extract from the New York Herald, containing an interview with Governor Obaldia, in which the above-mentioned facts were stated, and in which Señor Obaldia said that, before leaving Bogota, he had had several interviews with the American minister, to whom he had communicated these facts, which Mr. Beaupré had doubtless telegraphed to his Government.

The reading of this extract caused much excitement. Senator Caro pointed out that whatever the views of President Roosevelt may be, this much was certain, he had no intention of adopting the Nicaragua route. The only possible explanation of the present inactive attitude of the United States Government was that events on the Isthmus were being watched. Senator Caro then, for the first time, openly attacked the policy of the United States Government. Colombia was told that the construction of the canal was essential to the commerce and, therefore, to the progress of the world, and that she should not, therefore, stand in the way of so important an undertaking merely because of the loss of sovereignty over a small strip of territory. But why, he asked, did the United States wish to deprive Colombia of her sovereignty? It was because the United States wanted the canal for themselves and not for commerce and civilization.

Beaupré to Hay.

OCTOBER 31, 1903.

Congress adjourned to-day. No action has been taken upon the last report concerning the canal. Therefore nothing more than the vote of August 12 rejecting treaty done.

The people here in great anxiety over conflicting reports of secession movements in the Cauca and Panama.

After the rejection of the treaty and final adjournment of Congress the Colombian Government in its official notification to this Government of the fact placed the rejection of the treaty upon the hypocritical and unfounded ground that the provisions of the treaty invaded its sovereignty to such an extent as to threaten her territorial integrity. Here is the communication:

At the time it (the treaty) was signed by the Colombian plenipotentiary the country was in a state of siege.

Thus seeking to justify her unpardonable act by attempting to take advantage of the very fact which made it necessary to enter into the negotiations in April, 1902, when the Herrera revolution was about to succeed.

The country was in a state of siege; there was not any law giving authority to enter into such negotiations, and the national representatives could not consider the matter—

No, of course not; simply because the minister for foreign affairs in his request sent through Hart on September 11, 1902, says that until the American people put down the Herrera rebellion they would not call Congress together. That was the reason they could not consider it—and as the treaty implies the construction of public works on a large scale, and also the permanent occupation of a portion of the Colombian territory by the concessionary, who is not a subject liable to the laws of the country, but a sovereign political power, if the treaty were to be carried out two coexisting political powers would be established, one national and the other foreign, which would necessarily cause collisions and practically limit the jurisdiction of the nation on its own territory, and all this would be incompatible with the constitutional laws and the traditional organization of the Republic; and so a treaty of this nature could only be approved by a national convention or by a reforming act of the constitution effected in the manner herein provided.

The Senate declared by the same resolution that "the refusal to accept the treaty by the Congress does not mean in the least any change toward the United States, and solemnly confirms the sentiments of American confraternity which animate the Colombian people, as well as the friendly relations which have existed and shall exist unalterably between Colombia and the United States."

So far from this being true, it will be seen from the following provision that we had not only to guaranty her sovereignty to an extent that left us scarcely sufficient freedom of possession to construct and operate a canal, but she actually made us disclaim a purpose to increase our territory at the expense of Colombia or any of the sister republics in Central or South America.

Mr. SPOONER. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Hay-Herran treaty, which was rejected by Colombia.

I now read Article IV of that treaty:

ARTICLE IV.

The rights and privileges granted to the United States by the terms of this convention shall not affect the sovereignty of the Republic of Colombia over the territory within whose boundaries such rights and privileges are to be exercised.

The United States freely acknowledges and recognizes this sovereignty and disavows any intention to impair it in any way whatever or to increase its territory at the expense of Colombia or of any of the sister republics in Central or South America, but, on the contrary, it desires to strengthen the power of the republics on this continent and to promote, develop, and maintain their prosperity and independence.

It appears from the foregoing extracts from the official correspondence that the Marroquin Government was either too corrupt or too badly intimidated to give to the ratification of the treaty the support that the comity between nations and the history of this particular transaction made it its absolute duty to do. On the contrary, we find him refusing to commit himself unequivocally to its support by declining to perform the perfunctory act of signing his name thereto, and this after he had authorized its negotiation and approved its terms. We find the executive officers addressing communications to the canal company, proposing levies of blackmail, which could only be successfully made by denying the authority to sell contained in the first article of the Hay-Herran treaty and for which the Colombian Government was compensated in the payment of $10,000,000 provided for; find them scheming to deny the validity of an extension of the ten years granted to the canal company to complete its project on the pain of forfeiture, in the hope that after committing this act of spoliation they would be able to dispose of the same to the United States and receive the $40,000,000 contracted to be paid the canal company.

We find in the debates that took place on the general question of the treaty, and the circumstances under which it was made, the expression of an utter want of confidence in the Government and a covert indication of a belief that the United States had so complicated itself by the passage of the Spooner Act that it could not now go back to the Nicaragua route, and in consequence could be successfully blackmailed into paying an additional sum. Another large element in the Senate was so bitterly and uncompromisingly hostile to Marroquin and his administration that a purpose to undo him dominated all of its action and subordinated the desire to advance the public good to that of his obstruction. This element cared nothing for the interests of the United States nor the bad reputation for the want of good faith which Colombia would make by conforming her conduct to their suggestions. As Parez said in the article in the North American Review from which I have quoted, to them the amount of $10,000,000 was offensive; $50,000,000 would have been more so.

Just as I remarked a few moments ago, the recorded history of the entire transaction is evidence of the utter want of good faith upon the part of that Government; or, if its officers were acting in good faith, they were living in an environment that subjected them to the control of a despotism behind the throne greater than the throne itself; where the intrigues and cabals of politicians outweighed in importance the public good and blinded the judgment of those who should have advised that unhappy country of its rights and warned it of its dangers. They ought to have known, as one of the Senators stated upon the floor of the Senate, that the only protection for a weak nation is its good faith. They ought to have understood that the time for trifling with this great Government upon this great question had passed, that an offer had been made to them which exhausted every equity, which covered every value, which protected every right, which pandered to every whim—and Latin-American vanity is prolific of these latter—that fairness and justice in its fullest limit had been tendered to them, and that their opportunity was now.

They knew, or ought to have known from past experience, how lightly national attachment rested not only on Panama, but upon every other Department of the Colombian territory. They knew that the Isthmus, outside of the canal and railroad interests there, was of no value whatever, being in greater part wholly uninhabited. The Bogota Government knew, or should have known, that whenever it became evident that it was the purpose to defeat the treaty, thus driving the United States to Nicaragua, and thereby rendering the canal and railroad property valueless, a revolution would inevitably ensue. They did not have to go back very far in their history to learn this. It was repeated upon the floor of the Senate during its then session, time and again, and there was not the slightest attempt on anybody's part to deny or conceal the fact that if the treaty was not ratified another revolution would break out in Panama.

There is no fair-minded man who has considered in all its circumstances and details this transaction from the initiatory step taken to negotiate the Hay-Concha protocol down to the rejection of the Hay-Herran treaty, and the adjournment of the Colombian Congress on the 31st of October, 1903, and shall weigh these in the light of our historical and contract rights, but who will admit that on the 3d of November, 1903, a condition and not a theory confronted the authorities of the United States. Under no procedure recognized by international law were we permitted to do for Colombia what her officials should have had sense and patriotism enough to do for her—that is to say, by taking from her, without her consent, a canal strip on the Isthmus upon paying to her its fair and full value. But under existing and recognized modes of procedure we could not do this; but we could take due notice of what had actually transpired and observe with proper attention those other acts, the occurrence of which must inevitably follow, ready to avail ourselves of any proper opportunities that circumstances might develop. The Colombian Government and the Colombian people had demonstrated an utter incapacity to know their own interests, or a want of willingness to pursue them, that is amazing. Further negotiation on our part with Colombia was out of the question.

We were therefore warranted in a course of interested nonaction, having a right to assume that out of the chaos of inevitable revolution some adjustment would come that would approximate more nearly to justice than from the deliberations of the so-called Government of Colombia. We therefore stood at arm's length with Colombia. We accepted the situation. We had a right to say to her, in the homely language of the day, "You can paddle your own canoe. For the last fifty years we have been putting down insurrections on that Isthmus for you, looking to the time when it could be used for the construction of a canal to promote the commercial intercourse of the world. We have entertained negotiations at your invitation, in the progress of which we have provided ample and liberal pay for every right we sought to acquire from you and respected every suggestion of territorial protection and sovereignty that you expressed. Now we are convinced, beyond the necessity of further enlightenment, of your utter want of that self-respect, coherence, stability, and civic pride that is necessary to constitute any people a government to be dealt with and respected. Now, go your way."

In saying this we had no right to imply that we had it in contemplation to ourselves to invade her rights, or by corrupt connivance aid others to do so, notwithstanding our abundant provocation. We still rested under our traditional duty of dealing justly and fairly with all. But when mere matters of favor are considered we were restored to our absolute freedom in choosing the beneficiaries thereof. This we could well and justly say in the face of a full knowledge of what was going on on the Isthmus; not only what would go on there as the result of natural and local influences, but of what others might be encouraged to do as the result of assuming that this Government no longer intended to stand ready to suppress insurrections which the misgovernment of Bogota had made a necessity on Panama. These influences were sufficiently formidable to provoke a revolution against the Bogota Government, wholly regardless of any attitude of indifference that the United States might manifest.

In its last analysis the rejection of the Hay-Herran treaty and the continuance of the domination of Colombia over Panama meant that the United States Government would be forced to go to Nicaragua for a canal route. If this were done, the $40,000,000 to be paid for the canal property, as well as the value of the railway property, would be absolutely wiped out of existence. In all former revolutions on the Isthmus the influence of the promoters of these great enterprises was against revolution. Now a successful revolution was absolutely essential to their preservation. Fifty million dollars can mobilize a great many friends, particularly when it has its quarrel just. The foundation for the obligation to support a government consists in the duty and willingness of the government to protect those who support it. And when by the dishonesty and criminal folly of governmental action it becomes evident that the very purpose for which governments are established among men is being defeated by the government itself, the right of revolution becomes a duty.

Enterprises of the magnitude of the isthmian railroad and the Panama Canal necessarily require in their successful management many able men. That they had such it is unnecessary to go outside of these negotiations to be convinced. They and those with whom they cooperated had witnessed so many revolutions on the Isthmus that they had literally become experts in the business. This will account for the consummate skill as international lawyers they displayed in getting into possession of the Isthmus, the neutrality of which the United States Government was bound by solemn treaty to guaranty, by peaceable means, or, at all events, means that did not involve actual warfare. Thereafter they were secure from attack there.

Indeed, it is doubtful if they ever contemplated that a serious attack would be made upon them. They knew that as a result of the revolution of but a year ago, in which Herrera came so nearly being successful, that Colombia had become so exhausted in resources and military forces that she was compelled to impress boys from 9 to 15 years to fill the ranks of her army. The promoters of the revolution also had reasons to believe that, since governmental mismanagement and oppression had destroyed the sentiment of pride and patriotism among the people, no plea that Colombia could make to them to suppress people in other sections seeking to rid themselves of the same oppressive rule would meet with any response. It is, therefore, evident to anyone familiar with the situation of affairs and the history of the Isthmus that, independently of the then known or prospective attitude of the United States, in the revolution on the 3d of November, 1903, Panama began operations under more formidable auspices than any of its predecessors.

I do not find it necessary to deny that I believe that the President of the United States knew what was taking place on the Isthmus or what was likely to take place there. If it is necessary to show his ignorance of events there in order to establish his integrity, I maintain that this can only be done at the expense of his intelligence and sagacity, if not his fidelity to his duty. Every well-informed observer of public events knew it. It was the logical and necessary culmination of forces which the Colombians themselves had set at large. After the rejection of the treaty in the manner it was done we owed to the Colombians nothing and could afford to laugh when their calamity came. Our only duty in the premises was to ourselves, and that was to respect the cardinal principles of right and justice, refraining religiously from clandestinely or openly inflicting wrong upon her. That we did so refrain I have no doubt.

In what was done by the President and those acting under his orders irregularities may have occurred, I have no doubt. It is probably true that in some of the things done by the President he was, in the opinion of many, too hasty. It may be that in some things he displayed qualities which arouse indignation and subject him to criticism. But with his irregularities I have nothing to do. Others who stand nearer to him must take care of that. But with the fundamentals I must deal, because if I were convinced that he had been guilty of entering into a conspiracy to dismember that country, that fundamental fact would determine my course to vote against this treaty. So far as mere details and methods and incidents are concerned, they are matters for his friends to take care of and for his enemies to exploit as evidencing a tendency of charactor by which he is made to do wrong even when he seeks to do right. That is their business, and not mine.

Of course, an active conspiracy with the revolutionists or prior assurances of aid clandestinely given to them would constitute a fundamental violation of the principles of rights, and then to assume that after this had been done that the positive disclaimer contained in the President's message was untrue is to make a case of total depravity. Leaving out of the view the President's denial, not because I have any doubt about its sincerity, for I have none, the development of the facts show no aid or comfort given to the revolutionists prior to their declaration of independence, and any haste in thereafter extending recognition to the new Republic was a matter of detail and largely within the discretion of the President. A mistaken or improvident exercise of it furnishes no foundation for a charge of prior complicity. We were under no further obligation to Colombia to consider any incidental injury to her welfare that might come about as the result of the exercise of any of our discretionary powers of government.

Keeping within the boundaries of our rights, we could act as our interests or inclination prompted, wholly without responsibility to her. She had kept a Punic faith with us. A jury composed of nearly all the nations of the civilized world has rendered its verdict of the issue tendered by our action, and I see no reason why we should view it with less favor than they. Any sympathy bestowed on Colombia is, in my opinion, sympathy wasted.

Mr. President, it may serve to remove a misapprehension that is quite prevalent when I call attention to the fact that in the construction of an isthmian canal the United States is to reserve to herself no rights or privileges in its use that are not, upon the same terms, afforded to all of the nations of the earth. A realization of this fact will serve to disarm criticism aimed at our recognition of Panama upon the assumption that in so doing we sought by the power of might to acquire for ourselves a sordid and exclusive benefit in a great improvement which in its nature is vital to all. As showing the character of ownership we will possess with reference to its use, I call attention to the provision of the treaty of November 18, 1901.

Acting upon the belief that any negotiation entered into with Colombia or Nicaragua would be carried out in good faith, this Government made what is known as the "Hay-Pauncefote treaty" with Great Britain, by which it agreed to dedicate the canal, when constructed, to the commerce of the world upon terms of perfect equality and impartiality as to tolls and use and added a guaranty that absolute neutrality should be maintained in its zone. I confess that my benevolence is not sufficiently assimilated to impress me with the conviction that we should not have reserved to ourselves, at least to our coasting trade, some discriminating advantages. However, we entered into such a treaty with Great Britain, and here it is:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE II.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE III.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than twenty-four hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within twenty-four hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

It may be said and has been said that many of the things that were done conflicted with some of the declared principles of international law. Many of the arguments based on citations from this code, abstractly considered, seem sound and plausible, and all of them have been ably presented. I have heard with attention, and listened, under my responsibility as a Senator, with a desire to be instructed. I have become impressed with the fact, not only by what has been said here, but from such examination as I have been able to make on my own account, that it is true of international law, as with other codes, that no cause is so just that it can not be vigorously assailed, nor one so bad that it can not be earnestly defended, by generalities borrowed from the commentaries.

Many things are boldly asserted and plausibly maintained in attacking or defending a given action that are afterwards mistaken for the generally recognized principles of an accepted code and sought to be utilized in the solution of complications wholly dissimilar. Theoretically these generalities make for the establishment of a lofty standard of conduct, while in practical application no system is so inherently saturated with the belief that the end justifies the means as is the genius and spirit of international law. But even where this vice need not be reckoned with, the occasions are not few where a grotesque misapplication has been made in their use.

At the consummation of nearly every era-marking achievement in our history many of these venerable maxims of state morality have come forth as on dress parade, robed in the verbiage of a dignified protest against all progress, and keeping step to the dirge of pessimistical predictions of calamities to come hereafter.

A reference to two such instances will suffice for the purposes of the present occasion. When the bill making appropriation to pay the price for the Louisiana purchase was pending, from his seat in Congress, Josiah Quincy, a leading New England statesman of his time, said if the bill became a law it would free the States from their moral obligation, and as it would be the right of all, it would be the duty of some to prepare for a separation—amicably if they could, violently if they must. The doctrine of secession and nullification thus obtained its first practical application in New England.

Again, when Texas, now the Empire State of the South, and when the Panama Canal is in successful operation, will become the Empire State of the Union, was about to become a part of the great Republic, the legislature of Massachusetts, in its session of 1843, resolved:

That under no circumstances whatever can the people of Massachusetts regard the proposition to admit Texas into the Union in any other light than as dangerous to its continuance in peace, in prosperity, and in the enjoyment of those blessings which it is the object of a free government to secure.

The danger to the peace of the Union contemplated by this resolution could exist only in the determination of the New England States to forcibly resist the annexation of Texas or to secede from the Union at the happening of that event. The resolution was forwarded to Congress and to the several States. It was noticed on the part of Massachusetts that no matter under what circumstances Texas might be acquired by the Union, secession must follow. The succeeding legislature adopted a similar resolution, which it was directed should be sent to the Congress, and in this last it was solemnly resolved:

That the project for the annexation of Texas, unless arrested on the threshold, may tend to drive these States into a dissolution of the Union.

In our country it is the right of everybody to speak out against those things in public affairs which he does not approve. This is often necessary even where the things have become accomplished facts, if there is thought to be a wrong side to the transaction or in the manner of its accomplishment. The wholesome effect is to educate the public opinion of the country into an understanding of correct principles, because no government can maintain the confidence and respect of its own citizens that disregard the established principles of rights in its public acts and policies. No occasion is more appropriate for this than the pendency of some great even such as the present one, for it is difficult, almost to the point of impossibility, to impress these lessons in a mere abstract way, disassociated from some occasion large enough in its aspect to arouse the curiosity and interest of the people.

But this does not mean that whatever is done must be assumed to be wrong and wholly unjustifiable, unless in its scope and details it can escape academic criticism by those versed in the niceties of the doctrines of international law. These must be applied and understood rationally, leaving room for legitimate exercise of the aggressive spirit of progress, which is the mission of the American people; giving some consideration to the broader underlying principles and purposes which point to an event that justifies an action, which, upon first consideration, might seem to invite censure. Nor must we overlook the fact that many of the most important events in the world's history have been marred by intrigue and written in blood, but where the betterment of mankind has in the end justified them. I say a proper discussion of these things is useful to familiarize the people with the enlightened principles, and in this way to influence future action in preventing or making rarer the errors and the faults which enter into the history of things done, and which when once done are never to be undone.

History does not furnish an instance where mere discussion has turned a revolution backward or restored a sundered relation. Speaking in a less serious sense, the vigorous cataloguing of the list of principles supposed to be violated on any given occasion, finds its compensation in that they furnish the soothing and consolatory balm that the vanquished find in sympathy; thereby the loser, in the inevitable march to a manifest destiny, has his grievance sanctified in the assurance that the convulsion by which he was undone did not in all things come to pass "according to law." And these, as well, intensify the elation of the Pharisee as he returns unctuous thanks for being permitted to see the right with clearer vision than other men. Notwithstanding these observations, I would not advocate, nor do I excuse or justify, a departure from the fundamental principles of right either by a government or by an individual. And if there is to be drawn a distinction between the obligation which rests upon the one or the other, I insist that it rests more strongly upon a great government than upon an individual, because there is no tribunal to administer a penalty to or to correct the wrongs of a government, except war, or in a certain way, by the force of public opinion in its own country. The correction enforced by public opinion in other governments is not deemed to be of much practical value, since the rule there applied is that those who are "without fault shall cast the first stone."

I hazard nothing when I say that when this Panama affair is thoroughly discussed and thoroughly understood by our people that a fair and enlightened public opinion regarding the spirit of progress characteristic of the time, making allowance for the abruptness invited by the history of the occasion, will encounter nothing that can not be condoned without loss of the good opinion of others and of our own self-respect.

I have expressed the opinion that there is an absence of evidence to show affirmatively any complicity upon the part of our Government in the revolution at Panama, and have adverted to the fact that the business of revolution on the Isthmus had become an established industry, a resort to which had been made on many occasions when the provocation was very much less meritorious than this which called for action on the 3d of November. But I think the evidence of complicity of Marroquin's administration and Reyes in fomenting and encouraging secession of Panama up to the point where the revolution was announced is fairly well established from the facts and circumstances which have come to the surface in the course of the discussions here.

Bearing on this general question I here read the two official reports made by Commander Hubbard, the only American officer on the Isthmus until after the declaration of independence on the part of Panama was made:

U. S. S. NASHVILLE, THIRD RATE,
Colon, United States of Colombia, November 5, 1903.

SIR: Pending a complete report of the occurrences of the last three days in Colon, Colombia, I most respectfully invite the Department's attention to those of the date of Wednesday, November 4, which amounted to practically the making of war against the United States by the officer in command of the Colombian troops in Colon. At 1 o'clock p. m. on that date I was summoned on shore by a preconcerted signal, and on landing met the United States consul, vice-consul, and Colonel Shaler, the general superintendent of the Panama Railroad.

The consul informed me that he had received notice from the officer commanding the Colombian troops, Colonel Torres, through the prefect of Colon, to the effect that if the Colombian officers, Generals Tobal and Amaya, who had been seized in Panama on the evening of the 3d of November by the Independents and held as prisoners, were not released by 2 o'clock p. m. he, Torres, would open fire on the town of Colon and kill every United States citizen in the place, and my advice and action were requested. I advised that all the United States citizens should take refuge in the shed of the Panama Railroad Company, a stone building susceptible of being put into good state for defense, and that I would immediately land such body of men, with extra arms for arming the citizens, as the complement of the ship would permit. This was agreed to, and I immediately returned on board, arriving at 1.15 p. m.

The order for landing was immediately given, and at 1.30 p. m. the boats left the ship with a party of forty-two men under the command of Lieut. Commander H. M. Witzel, with Midshipman J. P. Jackson as second in command. Time being pressing, I gave verbal orders to Mr. Witzel to take the building above referred to, to put it into the best state of defense possible, and protect the lives of the citizens assembled there—not firing unless fired upon. The women and children took refuge on the German steamer Marcomania and Panama Railroad steamer City of Washington, both ready to haul out from dock if necessary. The Nashville I got under way and patrolled with her along the water front close in and ready to use either small-arm or shrapnel fire.

The Colombians surrounded the building of the railroad company almost immediately after we had taken possession, and for about one and a half hours their attitude was most threatening, it being seemingly their purpose to provoke an attack. Happily our men were cool and steady, and while the tension was very great, no shot was fired. At about 3.15 p. m. Colonel Torres came into the building for an interview and expressed himself as most friendly to Americans, claiming that the whole affair was a misapprehension and that he would like to send the alcalde of Colon to Panama to see General Tobal and have him direct the discontinuance of the show of force. A special train was furnished and safe conduct guaranteed. At about 5.30 p. m. Colonel Torres made the proposition of withdrawing his troops to Monkey Hill if I would withdraw the Nashville's force and leave the town in possession of the police until the return of the alcalde on the morning of the 5th.

After an interview with the United States consul and Colonel Shaler as to the probability of good faith in the matter, I decided to accept the proposition and brought my men on board, the disparity in numbers between my force and that of the Colombians, nearly ten to one, making me desirous of avoiding a conflict so long as the object in view, the protection of American citizens, was not imperiled.

I am positive that the determined attitude of our men, their coolness and evident intention of standing their ground, had a most salutary and decisive effect on the immediate situation and was the initial step in the ultimate abandoning of Colon by these troops and their return to Cartagena the following day. Lieutenant-Commander Witzel is entitled to much praise for his admirable work in command on the spot.

I feel that I can not sufficiently strongly represent to the Department the grossness of this outrage and the insult to our dignity, even apart from the savagery of the threat.

Very respectfully,

JOHN HUBBARD,
Commander, U. S. Navy, Commanding.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

In this letter of November 8 Commander Hubbard sets forth the facts more in detail:

U. S. S. NASHVILLE, THIRD RATE,
Porto Bello, U. S. Colombia, November 8, 1903.

SIR: 1. I have the honor to make the following report of the occurrences which took place at Colon and Panama in the interval between the arrival of the Nashville at Colon on the evening of November 2, 1903, and the evening of November 5, 1903, when by the arrival of the U. S. S. Dixie at Colon I was relieved as senior officer by Commander F. H. Delano, United States Navy.

2. At the time of the arrival of the Nashville at Colon, at 5.30 p. m. on November 2, everything on the Isthmus was quiet. There was talk of proclaiming the independence of Panama, but no definite action had been taken and there had been no disturbance of peace and order. At daylight on the morning of November 3 it was found that a vessel which had come in during the night was the Colombian gunboat Cartagena, carrying between 470 and 500 troops. I had her boarded and learned that these troops were for the garrison at Panama. Inasmuch as the Independent party had not acted and the Government of Colombia was at the time in undisputed control of the Province of Panama, I did not feel, in the absence of any instructions, that I was justified in preventing the landing of these troops, and at 8.30 o'clock they were disembarked.

The commanding officers, Generals Amaya and Tobal, with four others, immediately went over to Panama to make arrangements for receiving and quartering their troops, leaving the command in charge of an officer whom I later learned to be Colonel Torres. The Department's message addressed to the care of the United States consul I received at 10.30 a. m.; it was delivered to one of the ship's boats while I was at the consul's and not to the consul as addressed. The message was said to have been received at the cable office at 9.30 a. m. Immediately on deciphering the message I went on shore to see what arrangements the railroad company had made for the transportation of these troops to Panama, and learned that the company would not transport them except on request of the governor of Panama, and that the prefect at Colon and the officer left in command of the troops had been so notified by the general superintendent of the Panama Railroad Company.

I remained at the company's office until it was sure that no action on my part would be needed to prevent the transportation of the troops that afternoon, when I returned on board and cabled the Department the situation of affairs. At about 5.30 p. m. I again went on shore and received notice from the general superintendent of the railroad that he had received the request for the transportation of the troops and that they would leave on the 8 a. m. train on the following day. I immediately went to see the general superintendent, and learned that it had just been announced that a provisional government had been established at Panama—that Generals Amaya and Tobal, the governor of Panama, and four officers, who had gone to Panama in the morning, had been seized and were held as prisoners; that they had an organized force of 1,500 troops and wished the Government troops in Colon to be sent over. This I declined to permit, and verbally prohibited the general superintendent from giving transportation to the troops of either party.

It being then late in the evening, I sent early in the morning of November 4 written notification to the general superintendent of the Panama Railroad, to the prefect of Colon, and to the officer left in command of the Colombian troops, later ascertained to be Colonel Torres, that I had prohibited the transportation of troops in either direction, in order to preserve the free and uninterrupted transit of the Isthmus. Copies of these letters are hereto appended; also copy of my notification to the consul. Except to a few people, nothing was known in Colon of the proceedings in Panama until the arrival of the train at 10.45 on the morning of the 4th. Some propositions were, I was later told, made to Colonel Torres by the representatives of the new Government at Colon, with a view to inducing him to reembark in the Cartagena and return to the port of Cartagena, and it was in answer to this proposition that Colonel Torres made the threat and took the action reported in my letter No. 96, of November 5, 1903.

The Cartagena left the port just after the threat was made, and I did not deem it expedient to attempt to detain her, as such action would certainly, in the then state of affairs, have precipitated a conflict on shore which I was not prepared to meet. It is my understanding that she returned to Cartagena. After the withdrawal of the Colombian troops on the evening of November 4 and the return of the Nashville's force on board, as reported in my letter No. 96, there was no disturbance on shore, and the night passed quietly. On the morning of the 5th I discovered that the commander of the Colombian troops had not withdrawn so far from the town as he had agreed, but was occupying buildings near the outskirts of the town.

I immediately inquired into the matter and learned that he had some trivial excuse for not carrying out his agreement, and also that it was his intention to occupy Colon again on the arrival of the alcalde, due at 10.45 a. m., unless General Tobal sent word by the alcalde that he, Colonel Torres, should withdraw. That General Tobal had declined to give any instructions I was cognizant of, and the situation at once became quite as serious as on the day previous. I immediately landed an armed force, reoccupied the same building; also landed two 1-pounders and mounted them on platform cars behind protection of cotton bales, and then in company with the United States consul had an interview with Colonel Torres, in the course of which I informed him that I had relanded my men because he had not kept his agreement; that I had no interest in the affairs of either party; that my attitude was strictly neutral; that the troops of neither side should be transported; that my sole purpose in landing was to protect the lives and property of American citizens if threatened, as they had been threatened, and to maintain the free and uninterrupted transit of the Isthmus, and that purpose I should maintain by force if necessary.

I also strongly advised that, in the interests of peace and to prevent the possibility of a conflict that could not but be regrettable, he should carry out his agreement of the previous evening and withdraw to Monkey Hill.

Colonel Torres's only reply was that it was unhealthy at Monkey Hill, a reiteration of his love of Americans, and persistence in his intention to occupy Colon, should General Tobal not give him directions to the contrary.

On the return of the alcalde at about 11 a. m. the Colombian troops marched into Colon, but did not assume the threatening demeanor of the previous day. The American women and children again went on board the Marcomania and City of Washington, and through the British vice-consul I offered protection to British subjects, as directed in the Department's cablegram. A copy of the British vice-consul's acknowledgment is hereto appended.

The Nashville I got under way, as on the previous day, and moved close in to protect the water front. During the afternoon several propositions were made to Colonel Torres by the representatives of the new Government, and he was finally persuaded by them to embark on the Royal Mail steamer Orinoco with all his troops and return to Cartagena. The Orinoco left her dock with the troops—474 all told—at 7.35 p. m. The Dixie arrived and anchored at 7.05 p. m., when I went on board and acquainted the commanding officer with the situation. A portion of the marine battalion was landed and the Nashville's force withdrawn.

* * * * * * *

4. I beg to assure the Department that I had no part whatever in the negotiations that were carried on between Colonel Torres and the representatives of the provisional government; that I landed an armed force only when the lives of American citizens were threatened, and withdrew this force as soon as there seemed to be no grounds for further apprehension of injury to American lives or property; that I relanded an armed force because of the failure of Colonel Torres to carry out his agreement to withdraw and announced intention of returning, and that my attitude throughout was strictly neutral as between the two parties, my only purpose being to protect the lives and property of American citizens and to preserve the free and uninterrupted transit of the Isthmus.

Very respectfully,

JOHN HUBBARD,
Commander, United States Navy, Commanding.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

By consulting the newspaper accounts and other reliable sources of information, mainly for identifying the persons referred to in this correspondence, we can readily come to the belief that the Bogota Government deliberately brought about a condition where the power of ratifying the Hay-Herran treaty could be exercised by the President of Colombia without the intervention of the legislative branch of the Government, as he is authorized to do by their constitution after martial law has been proclaimed. In the extracts taken from the correspondence between our minister to Colombia, Mr. Beaupré, and the Secretary of State it is made plain that Marroquin's appointment of Señor Obaldia as governor of the Department of Panama was understood to be the first step in the secession of that Department should the Colombian Congress refuse to ratify the canal treaty. This was not only asserted in debate, but was actually made the occasion for resolution of censure, voted upon and adopted by the Senate. No effort at concealment was made by the members of the Colombian Congress from Panama in asserting the purpose to set up a separate government if the ratification of the treaty should fail. This was asserted so often and so publicly, and harmonized so completely with the previous history of the Isthmus in the matter of a revolution, that it came to be taken for granted.

Marroquin was well aware of the history and sentiments of Obaldia, and the appointment under the circumstances of the latter could only be understood on the Isthmus as a manifestation of sympathy on the part of the President in any movement they might make to precipitate revolution. I do not assume that it was the intention of Marroquin and Reyes, nor, for that matter, Governor Obaldia, that the revolution should succeed to the extent that afterwards turned out to be the case. It suited the purpose of President Marroquin to allow the revolution to progress to a point where he would be authorized, under the constitution, to declare martial law as a means to its suppression. This act would incidentally give him the power to negotiate and ratify treaties. Considering the hostile environment in which he was seeking to administer the Government, and the violence and utter want of patriotism manifested in their factional contests on the part of those who, in the regular course, should cooperate with him in concluding the negotiations for the construction of the canal, we may well accredit him with a motive not altogether reprehensible when we attribute to him the purpose to acquiesce in a revolution at Panama formidable enough to warrant him in taking into his own hands the whole power of government under his authority to declare martial law.

He knew that the Hay-Herran treaty was as favorable to Colombia as any that he could ever hope to obtain; that it not only contained the best terms that could be secured, but it contained all that in fairness could be demanded. He knew the hopeless state of bankruptcy that existed in his country, and how greatly the magnificent sum to be paid under the terms of the treaty would advance the interests of his unhappy country. He was likewise well aware that under the terms of the Spooner Act, whenever it became plain that no concession could be obtained from Colombia, that negotiations would be concluded looking to the construction of the canal on the Nicaragua route, and that in this event the splendid values on the Isthmus in the way of the railway and the partially completed canal would be entirely destroyed and the causes of strife among his people there infinitely increased. In the light of this suggestion I call attention to the facts set out in Commander Hubbard's reports. Before doing so I will say that the persons referred to in the commander's report by title were as follows: The governor of Panama, Obaldia; the superintendent of the railway, Colonel Shaler, a native of Kentucky, and known locally as the "King of the Isthmus," and a leading spirit in the revolution; the alcalde of Colon, who was sent to Colon by Torres on the evening of the 4th, one Melendez.

It appears from a telegram sent to the State Department by Malmros, the American consul at Colon, that the troops who arrived at Colon on the night of the 2d of November were not expected until the 10th. Malmros is a native of Colon and a sympathizer with the revolution. It thus appears that the revolutionists were advised of what was going on at Bogota in so far, at least, as the movement of troops was concerned. After the arrival of the troops at Colon on the morning of the 3d for the pretended purpose of being transported to Panama to constitute a garrison there, ostensibly to keep down a revolution, they were permitted to remain in Colon while Generals Tobal and Amaya went over to Panama to arrange quarters, as it was said. The 475 troops were left at Colon in charge of Colonel Torres.

Instead of awaiting orders from Panama, to be given by General Amaya as to when Torres should proceed to Panama, it seems that the latter applied for transportation for his troops during the day of the 3d. This Colonel Shaler, superintendent of the railway, refused to furnish unless he was requested to do so by Governor Obaldia. Later in the day Obaldia furnished Colonel Shaler with the necessary request to send the troops forward. It is difficult to explain why Obaldia, the head of the revolutionary party, should desire the Government troops sent to the point at which the revolution was to be proclaimed within a few hours, unless it is admitted that he fully understood what their attitude was to be after they reached Panama. It also appears from the concluding clause of the second paragraph from Commander Hubbard's report of November 8 that after the revolution was proclaimed and its leaders had organized a force of 1,500 troops they requested that these so-called Colombian troops at Colon under Torres be then sent over to Panama.

It is shown that on the 4th numerous "propositions" were made by the representative of the new Government to Colonel Torres at Colon, and that after one of these consultations with Melendez, the alcalde of Colon, and which was carried on in a well-known cafe of that town, Torres appeared on the streets at 12 o'clock and announced publicly that he intended to slay all the American citizens in Colon unless the Generals, Tobal and Amaya, were released by 2 o'clock. This declaration on his part necessarily created consternation among the Americans, and knowledge of the threat having been made was promptly communicated to Commander Hubbard, who proceeded to fortify the depot building and to assemble there all the American citizens who believed in good faith that this warlike preparation was necessary to prevent their extermination. After thus affording a pretext requiring the American forces to land for the first time on Colombia's soil, for a purpose unmistakably justified under the practice of nations, and in doing so made a show of force that would afford Torres an excuse for any course that he might have it in mind to pursue as the result of his negotiations with Melendez, Torres entered the fortified building and notified the officers in charge that he had no intention of injuring any American citizen, but on the contrary he loved them very much.

It became necessary for Melendez to procure from Panama sinews of war of a certain kind much sought in Colombia. Torres, under the pretext of having the alcalde obtain from the imprisoned General Tobal an order authorizing him (Torres) to withdraw, secured as the result of this interview, at 3.45, a special train to carry the alcalde to Panama at once. At 10.45 on the 5th Melendez returned to Colon, and it is a fact that is not denied that he brought with him $8,000, which was paid over to Torres without any effort at concealment, and after receiving the money Torres brought his soldiers into the town of Colon, and Commander Hubbard's report says upon this second entrance: "They did not assume the threatening demeanor of the previous day." The story is that $3,000 of the money was publicly paid to the troops on the pier of the Royal Mail Line, and that shortly thereafter the troops, together with Colonel Torres, departed for Cartagena.

The 600 or more Colombian soldiers stationed at Panama under the command of General Huertes were likewise won over to the revolutionists by bribery, and thereafter constituted part of their force, and do now. There is not the slightest doubt that the troops which reached Colon on the 2d of November were intended to form part of the revolutionary force at Panama, and that Marroquin and Reyes knew this to be true. That the show of force that the revolutionists could make when these soldiers were added to the garrison already at Panama, Marroquin would be furnished with the pretext for declaring martial law, which he could justify when assailed by his political rivals by calling attention to the force at the disposal of the revolutionists. This is clearly shown by the following telegram sent by the minister from Bogota on the 6th of November. It sustains perfectly what the foregoing circumstances make probable:

Beaupré to Hay.

BOGOTA, November 6, 1903.

November 6, 6 p. m. Knowing that the revolution has already commenced in Panama, ——— says that if the Government of the United States will land troops to preserve Colombian sovereignty and the transit, if requested by the Colombian chargé d'affaires, this Government will declare martial law, and by virtue of vested constitutional authority, when public order is disturbed, will approve by decree the ratification of the canal treaty as signed; or if the Government of the United States prefers, will call extra session of Congress with new and friendly members next May to approve the treaty.

General Reyes has the perfect confidence of vice-president, he says and if it becomes necessary will go to the Isthmus or send representatives there to adjust matters along above lines to the satisfaction of the people there. If he goes, he would like to act in harmony with commander of United States forces. This is the personal opinion of Reyes, and he will advise this Government to act accordingly. There is a great reaction of public opinion in favor of the treaty, and it is considered certain that the treaty was not legally rejected by Congress. To-morrow martial law will be declared; 1,000 troops will be sent from the Pacific side; about the same number from the Atlantic side. Please answer by telegraph.

BEAUPRÉ.

The same is true of the following telegram of the 7th:

Beaupré to Hay.

BOGOTA, November 7, 1903.

November 7, 2 p. m. General Reyes leaves next Monday for Panama invested with full powers. He has telegraphed chiefs of the insurrection that his mission is to the interests of Isthmus. He wishes answer from you before leaving to the inquiry in my telegram of yesterday and wishes to know if the American commander will be ordered to cooperate with him and with new Panama Government to arrange peace and approval of the canal treaty, which will be accepted on condition that the integrity of Colombia be preserved.

He has telegraphed President of Mexico to ask the Government of the United States and all the countries represented at the Pan-American conference to aid Colombia to preserve her integrity. The question of the approval of the treaty mentioned in my telegram of yesterday will be arranged in Panama. He asks that before taking definite action you will await his arrival there, and that the Government of the United States in the meantime preserve the neutrality and transit of the Isthmus, and do not recognize the new Government. Great excitement here. Martial law has been declared in the Cauca and Panama. Answer.

BEAUPRÉ.

It will not fail to attract attention that this is a very mild and unconcerned form of communication, considering that there was to be an effort in good faith to suppress the outbreak.

It will also not escape attention that General Reyes importuned the United States Government to take no definite action until he arrived at Panama and had an opportunity to consult with the new Panama Government, and urges above all things the United States Government must not recognize the new Government. To do that would cause his whole scheme in bringing about the revolution to miscarry.

Then again, on the point of the utter want of confidence Colombia had in her people being able to suppress the revolution, it may be well to note that our minister, on November 7, sent this telegram:

BOGOTA, November 7, 1903.

As the Government of the United States has war vessels at Panama and Colon, minister for foreign affairs has requested me to ask will you allow Colombian Government to land troops at those ports—to fight there and on the line of railway? Also, if the Government of the United States will take action to maintain Colombian right and sovereignty on the Isthmus in accordance with article 35, the treaty of 1846, in case the Colombian Government is entirely unable to suppress the secession movement there.

Here it is squarely admitted that a contingency was likely to come about where the Colombian Government would be entirely unable to suppress the secession movement at Panama. Well this doubt might be expressed, for the revolution then in progress had more elements of strength to support it than any of its predecessors, and, in addition to this, it found the United States in a relationship to Colombia that had never existed on any former occasion. In support of this supposition of knowledge and complicity on the part of Marroquin and Reyes, the following letter from Vice-Consul Ehrman is relevant, as showing that the whole revolution was brought about by a previous arrangement:

No. 463.] CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Panama, November 9, 1903.

Hon. FRANCIS B. LOOMIS,
Assistant Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to report that on the 3d of November, at about 6 p. m., there occurred an uprising in the city of Panama. It seems that everything had been prearranged with the officials of the army and navy, as there was practically accord among all the officers. General Tovar, General Castro, and Commander Tovar of the gunboat Bogota, finding out about the movement just a short while before it occurred, rushed to the barracks in the hope of frustrating the plans; but on their arrival General Huertas, second in command of the troops stationed at Panama, and chief of the "Colombia Battalion," ordered the soldiers out and arrested the above-mentioned generals, together with Governor Obaldia. The movement was to occur at 8 o'clock, but as the people had assembled and everything in readiness they moved at 6 o'clock. At 8 o'clock a boat was sent off from the gunboat Bogota, saying that unless Generals Tovar and Castro were set at liberty immediately they would bombard the town. This note was not answered by the people on shore.

At about 10 o'clock on the night of the 3d the Bogota fired several shells, which were answered by the fort. These shots struck in different parts of the city, and one Chinaman was killed. After firing, the Bogota hoisted her anchor and steamed away. She was supposed to be behind some islands which are directly in front of Panama. On the morning of the 4th I received information direct from one of the chiefs of the movement, and he said that the Bogota had threatened to again bombard the city, and on this I immediately sent word by telegraph to the commander of the Nashville and cabled the Department.

The gunboat Twenty-first of November (Padilla) was lying off Panama all this time, but did not try to intercept or pursue the Bogota. On the morning of the 4th the Twenty-first of November came in and anchored near the fort, and in the afternoon of the same day hauled down the Colombian flag and hoisted the flag of Panama. In the afternoon of the 4th, at 3 p. m., there was a general mass meeting held in the central plaza, and the declaration of independence was read and signed. The following is a list of the Government officials, as given me by the committee of the provisional government:

Committee of provisional government, J. A. Arango, Tomas Arias, and Federico Boyd; minister of government, Eusebio A. Morales; minister of foreign relations, F. V. De la Espriella; minister of war and marine, Nicanor A. De Obarrio; minister of justice, Carlos A. Mendoza; minister of finance, Manuel E. Amador; minister of public instruction, Julio J. Fabrega; chief of the division of Panama, Gen. Domingo Diaz; general in chief of the army of the Republic, Gen. Esteban Huertas; commander of civil battalion, Gen. Manuel Quintero; general treasurer of the Republic, Señor Albino Arosemena; commander of the gunboat Twenty-first of November, Gen. H. O. Jeffries.

* * * * * * *

FELIX EHRMAN,
United States Vice-Consul-General.

An important discrepancy is also made apparent in this communication. In all of the other official documents it appears that on the occasion of the outbreak at Panama the Colombian Generals Tobal and Amaya were the generals arrested and imprisoned. Ehrman says that General Castro, instead of Amaya, was the one arrested and imprisoned. Castro does not figure elsewhere in the history of the transaction, nor does Ehrman state what became of Amaya. It is said in the newspaper accounts that he was to succeed Obaldia as governor of the Department, being the principal man in the entire party connected on either side with the revolution.

But their whole scheme came to nothing by the action of the United States and other governments in recoguizing the independence of the Republic of Panama. The hopes of the best of the Colombians and the intrigues of all had at last and forever passed into history. She had attempted to make Shylock's barga'n and met Shylock's fate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question before he leaves the subject he has just been discussing. I will preface the question with the statement that I agree with the Senator that the revolution was instigated and engineered by the Panama Canal Company, and that the revolution was not discouraged by Marroquin, not, of course, because he was in favor of or wished the separation of Panama from Colombia, but in order that an excuse might be furnished him for declaring martial law so that he might again open up negotiations with the United States and make a treaty with this country, which the Constitution would permit in the case of martial law, without requiring the consent of the Colombian Congress.

I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas, in view of the ease with which he has shown the insurgents induced the military forces and a part of the naval forces of Colombia located at Panama to pull down the Colombian flag and side with the revolutionists, and in view of the ease with which the insurgents made arrangements, not to use a harsher term, with Torres by which, right on the eve of a conflict, he took the troops which the Government of Colombia had sent to Colon and left; and in view of the known fact that in a case of revolution at least three other Departments of Colombia would in all probability, I might say would almost certainly, have gone to the assistance of Panama, if in his opinion, in view of these facts, the United States had held aloof and not interfered, there would not have been a serious struggle as a result of the assistance which Panama would have received from the three other Departments, and as a result of lukewarmness on the part of an element of the Colombian army? Would not there have been a serious struggle, the result of which would not have been so free from doubt as those Senators contend who have said upon this floor that the Government of Panama could not have lived a day unless the United States had taken it under her protection?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I can only say as to that, that it is well known that in the revolution, which we may designate as the Herrera rebellion, and which collapsed about a year since, that the revolutionists were virtually successful when the intervention of the United States in behalf of Colombia put an end to the strife just at a time when the revolutionists were about to achieve their independence. In that revolution the power and influence of the Panama Railway and Canal companies were against the revolutionists. Now, these great corporations are enlisted in promoting the revolution actively, and its prominent officers and agents are openly identified with it, while the corporations, as institutions, are energized in its support by the fear that upon its failure their vast properties must be rendered valueless by the adoption by the United States of the alternative prescribed in the Spooner law. Through the resources of the railway and canal companies, which constitute the backbone of the revolution, the means of supplying the soldiers and paying them is vastly increased.

I should say, without hesitation, that the demoralized state of affairs in which the revolution of 1902 left Colombia—its fighting force was reduced to where she was compelled to impress boys from 9 to 15 years of age for her army, bankrupting her treasury and credit, and costing the lives of 100,000 of her people, as the result of the three years' strife incident to that rebellion—that almost any well-equipped body of three or four thousand men would be able to maintain themselves to such an extent that it must be evident to the governments interested in the affairs of the Isthmus that the time had come that would justify the recognition of the Panama Republic. The people of the Isthmus are practically unanimous in their support of this revolution. They constitute about 300,000 people. From this number, struggling to be rid of the semibarbarism known as the Bogota Government, a very formidable army can be enrolled, particularly when they have an opportunity to draw on the resources of the canal and railway companies to supply the arms and munitions of war.

It appears from the information furnished to our President by Captain Humphrey and Lieutenant Murphy that the revolutionists have already been supplied with warlike material. In the revolution that closed in 1902 the Departments of Cauca and Bolivar were in alliance with the Department of Panama. It is probable, almost to the extent of a certainty, that upon any showing by Panama which would justify the belief that her efforts would be successful that these Departments would join with her in the revolutionary movement. In fact the Department of Cauca is in a virtual state of revolution now, and, among the documents printed for the use of the Senate in connection with the consideration of this treaty, one contains a communication showing that the principal general of the army stationed in that Department has frankly notified President Marroquin that he would not hesitate to join in a revolution if certain reforms which he indicated were not introduced into the policies of the local government.

Mr. President, it may be that notwithstanding the reckless and perfidious course of Colombia she still has some right of property that must be taken into consideration in the adjustment of the controversies that have grown out of the recent revolution and may hereafter grow out of it. I infer from what is said in the following provision, taken from Article I of the Hay-Herran treaty, that Colombia is a stockholder in the New Panama Canal Company:

> But it is understood that Colombia reserves all its rights to the special shares in the capital of the New Panama Canal Company to which reference is made in Article IV of the contract of December 10, 1890, which shares shall be paid their full nominal value at least; but as such right of Colombia exists solely in its character of stockholder in said company, no obligation under this provision is imposed upon or assumed by the United States.

The right of property indicated by the recital in this article is one of which she has not been deprived by events in her recent history. I am sure I feel warranted in saying, if, upon a full investigation, it shall be made to appear that she has a proprietary interest in this canal stock, or in any other property to which we may acquire title, that all her rights will be duly ascertained and properly respected.

Complaint is made that the President should have declared the negotiations looking to the selection of the Panama route to be at an end and begun negotiations looking to the construction of a canal over the Nicaragua route. Under the Spooner Act it was left to the President to determine when "a reasonable time" had expired.

There was an attempt made in one of the Houses of Congress—I have forgotten which—to fix a period within which he must begin negotiations with Costa Rica and Nicaragua. But that limitation was not put in the law, and the President was left free to exercise his own judgment about it. In view of my decided preference for a sea-level canal over one of lock-and-dam construction, I believe I should have been justified, and I believe the President was justified, in delaying for a very considerable time the adoption of the Nicaragua route. At all events he should have delayed it until he considered it beyond any kind of cavil that there was no prospect of obtaining authority to build a canal on the Panama route. Particularly is this the case in view of the character of treatment which the treaty had received at Bogota, and that up to October 31, 1903, our minister at Bogota was daily advising the State Department that there was a large element there who still believed that something would come out of the canal situation, and that all this is to be considered in connection with the fact that on the 20th day of October, 1903, a special session of our Congress was called to meet on November 9.

Even if the time had been fixed in the statute, I believe the difference to the country between a sea-level canal and a lock-and-dam canal is so great that the President would have been justified in awaiting the further judgment of Congress before adopting the Nicaragua route. An act of Congress, when considered in court or by an officer charged with its enforcement in an administrative way, is as binding as a provision of the Constitution; it is the law of the land; but when it is brought into consideration before Congress itself in the legislative fixing of a policy, it does not amount to so much, because Congress made it and Congress can change it. "A breath can make them as a breath has made."

I do not believe that any objection growing out of the fact of this delay would warrant me in saying that to permit it would be setting a precedent that will operate in the end to the greater detriment of the Government than to defeat the treaty.

To say nothing of its obvious superiority on every other account and from every other point of view, I believe that a sea-level canal is the only kind of a canal that can attract business enough to prevent the enterprise from becoming a burden to the revenues of the United States Government. While I believe that much will come out of the building of the canal, I have never believed that the very extravagant statements which we find in the press of the country and in the discussions here will be verified in actual results.

From New York to the Philippines and to southern China the distance through the Suez Canal is shorter than it will be through the Panama Canal, and an amount of business sufficient in volume to make the Panama Canal a profitable enterprise will have to take part of the business that now goes through the Suez Canal, not only from Europe, but from the northeastern ports of America.

Ships are now being built on a scale that will not permit them to go through the Suez Canal unless its channel is deepened, as was done once since it was built. That canal has now a depth of only 27 feet 10 inches. There are several ships coming into our ports, and which have only recently been built, such as the Celtic and the Cedric, that draw, when loaded, 32 feet. Such boats as these will be the carriers of the future, and we shall need a canal at least 35 feet in depth in order to be able to afford a passage from ocean to ocean to the best class of ships, and which can not use the Suez Canal.

It was estimated that during the year 1901—that is the last year for which I have had occasion to examine the statistics—the Suez Canal carried 13,000,000 tons, which were carried at a cost of about $1.36 a ton, leaving a vast profit to the owners of the canal. The stock, on the basis of $100,000,000, is selling at 10 for 1. The British Government owns more than half of it, and the canal gets its business to the extent of three-fourths from English shippers. Three-fourths of the tonnage that passed through that canal in 1901 went through on English ships. It is not to be presumed that England is going to see her interests as a stockholder destroyed or allowed to dwindle into insignificance, if she can prevent it, by reason of a canal being built at Panama.

Another development of the situation necessary to be taken into the account is the fact that the transcontinental trunk lines of railway are even now getting ready to operate lines of first-class ships in connection with the railways, from our Pacific ports to the Orient. It is said that four of the best ships afloat have been or are now being built at New London, Conn., for the Northern Pacific Railway Company, to be employed in trans-Pacific shipping. So it is, that the only way we can get business enough to make the canal profitable, or even self-sustaining, is by offering one that will afford better facilities than any existing route can furnish.

Of course, in the matter of defense the canal will be of direct and vital benefit to us, because it will enable us to more effectively and economically defend our seacoast and possessions than can be done if we are required to maintain separate squadrons, one on the Pacific and another on the Atlantic shores.

The business that can be attracted by the canal is estimated by the Canal Commission at 6,000,000 tons. At any rate of charge that will enable the canal to compete with that at Suez, that will not yield enough income to pay the fixed charges and the operating expenses. That estimate is on the basis of a lock-and-dam canal.

It is thought that a sea-level canal can be constructed for $300,000,000. At the rate of interest of 2 per cent prescribed in the Spooner Act it will require $6,000,000 a year to pay the fixed charges, and $2,000,000 more is estimated to be required to pay the operating expenses. There must be business enough secured for that. If this can be secured, then the enterprise will not cost the people of the United States a single cent, because the investment will take care of itself out of its income, but for every dollar of income less than that $8,000,000 there will be a charge upon the revenues of the United States Government. Incidental to the matter of getting business for the canal we come to the matter of competing for the carrying business to and from the Far East. We must, in order to be able to carry the freight for the same or less rates that European ships can carry it, have a canal that will admit the passage of the very largest ships that can be built. Ships that draw 32 feet of water and more are the ships that will be employed in our commerce in the future, because by reason of their great size economies of management will be introduced that will make it possible to reduce the freight rates beyond the reach of European competition through the Suez, where ships of even 28 feet can not pass.

Because of this and other reasons I strongly favor a sea-level canal as against a lock-and-dam canal anywhere. So firmly am I wedded to this preference that any time necessary to get one would be, in my estimation, "a reasonable time." It may be that some such preference of route has influenced the President's action. Whether it did or not, and independently of my decided preference for a site at which a sea-level canal is a possibility, I do not think that there has been such an unreasonable delay in turning to the Nicaragua as to justify the charge that the matter has been so unreasonably delayed as to make it evident that he ought to be rebuked for his contumacy by a vote against the ratification of this treaty.

It is a matter of great gratification to me that the Panama Canal question has not been treated as one that should encounter the strife and opposition of party conflict. It is really not a partisan, and, least of all, not a nonpartisan, question; it is a bipartisan question in the sense that it is entitled to that energetic support that is given by parties to any declared policy, in contradistinction to the namby-pamby support that nonpartisan questions receive as they drift to their destiny. Both the great parties are on record in their respective platforms as favoring an isthmian canal. Then, if I am right in assuming it to be a bipartisan question, when called upon to deal with the Democratic side of it, I am gratified to be able to say that the only approval the President has received for his action in Panama in the popular expressions of the country has come from Democratic sources.

Democratic legislatures, Democratic boards of trade, and Democratic citizens throughout the country have manifested their approval in open, unmistakable, and enthusiastic expressions. On the other hand, popular Republican approval of his course is conspicuous only because of its entire absence. The Democratic party is proud of its history connected with an isthmian canal. Democratic statesmanship and foresight of sixty years ago made it a possibility through our diplomatic policies in the assertion and maintenance of a purpose to permit no progress in its establishment that did not recognize and respect our interests and our voice in its protection and control. And indispensable Democratic votes to-day will make it a certainty. I say this with some boldness, since listening to the persistent and earnest appeals made by my versatile and learned friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to the Senators on the other side of the Chamber to rise above mere party schemes in its consideration. If these appeals shall influence the votes of any considerable number of his party associates to the extent of inducing them for once in their lives to do a patriotic and praiseworthy act by supporting this great movement in the world's advancement, they will find on this side of the Chamber enough willing Democratic champions of the canal project to unite with them to take out of the list of mere probabilities this great enterprise.

I have said that evidence of popular approval of the President's course in Republican ranks is wanting, notwithstanding he has called down upon his head plausible and caustic criticism by some of the ablest and most fair-minded men in this Chamber, by reason of the lengths that he felt authorized to go in the advancement of this great enterprise. In fact, I think I may go further and say that popular approval of the President himself is somewhat scant, if we may rely upon the surface indications.

He is now the central figure of a continuous Belshazzar's feast, awaiting in perturbation of spirit for some friendly Daniel to come forth who can interpret the handwriting on the wall, so that he may know definitely what the chairman of the Republican national committee intends to do—"to fish" or "to cut bait." It is deemed a matter of sufficient importance to be blazoned forth to the country in box-car headlines when Alaska has instructed her delegates to the national Republican convention in favor of his reelection. It is likewise an event calling for friendly journalistic exploitation when the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] sends out to Boston orders that the collector, surveyor of the port, and the postmaster at Boston shall announce unequivocally that they are for Roosevelt and that they intend to see that the delegation from Massachusetts is instructed in favor of his candidacy, and that they shall see to it that any efforts to Hannaize or Democratize the Republican State convention of Massachusetts shall, through their joint and combined efforts directed by the junior Senator aforesaid, come to naught.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. I am sure the Senator does not mean to attribute to me words that I did not utter. They appeared in the newspapers, but I am not responsible for them. I saw the statement in a newspaper, but I assure the Senator nothing of that sort was said by me.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. "Et tu, Brute!" Then to whom can the President look for comfort and succor in this his hour of travail? So it is even doubtful whether the three Federal officials of Boston are actually for Roosevelt, and the Republican convention of Massachusetts is not entirely safe from the danger of being Hannaized or Democratized.

Again, we find in the now rock-ribbed Republican State of Ohio, after having just recorded an almost indecent majority of 125,000, that a veteran who has served that party for a quarter of a century, displaying every type of activity from the "fire-alarm" variety down to a present well-nigh innocuous docility, can no longer hope to appear in his prescriptive capacity as delegate at large except it be upon condition that he shall forego the right to inscribe upon his banner a formal inscription of his well-known preference for the President's reelection.

This reluctance to permit the Republican masses of the country to express themselves in formal instructions to their delegates is unprecedented in the history of parties in this country and discloses a condition of mistrust in their ranks that can not but be cheering to the friends of good government.

On the other hand, what is the condition in the Democratic ranks? Even its vigilant enemies proclaim to the world that it is "becoming sane and dangerous." The countenance of every Democrat is radiant with the smiles of hope and promise of a better day near at hand. The breezes are fairly laden with the sound of the tramp of feet and the hum of voices of the hosts as they approach the shrine of Democracy to there renew their pledges to the party that has always sought to maintain a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. I do not intend without an humble protest from me to see these patriots elbowed away from that shrine now and allow it to be converted into a Wailing Place against which shall be poured forth the lamentations of those who misunderstand their country's destiny or doubt her ability to achieve it.

I think, rather, that we should profit by the inspiration of the time, and without calling sinners to full repentance, should strive for harmony of effort and action. For through this we see a hope for the triumph of Democratic principles and policies, and when these guide the destinies of this nation its safety and advancement are secure.

But all this, Mr. President, is outside of the purpose of the present occasion. The matter here under discussion is one international in its character. If in carrying out some of its details there occurred that which might be turned to party advantage, I should reluctantly avail myself of it, for in doing so I can see that my country might suffer loss of prestige among the nations of the earth. The Democratic party has never sought to predicate its success upon the loss of dignity or national pride that would inevitably ensue from such a course, and I trust it never will. No matter how widely and vigorously we may differ as to internal policies or to policies relating to future international affairs, I believe I may say when it comes to a matter that has passed into history the Democratic party never has and never will, in my humble opinion, insist that this country shall stand discredited before the nations of the earth by insisting upon an abandonment and retreat from any position taken.

Partisanship ceases at the water's edge; there the glorious spirit of national pride works its magic; there the black flag of party conflict is transformed into the resplendent folds of the red, white, and blue, typical of the loyalty and unity of American citizenship; there the discordant notes of angry political discussion blend with the music of the murmuring waves and are borne to foreign shores as the soul-stirring strains of "The Star-Spangled Banner."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 2871) to incorporate the Mutual Investment Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 7024) to name streets, avenues, alleys, highways, and reservations in that part of the District of Columbia outside the city of Washington, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 7869) in relation to bonds on contracts with the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 8692) to authorize the apprehension and detention of insane persons in the District of Columbia, and providing for their temporary commitment in the Government Hospital for the Insane, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 9293) to create a board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 10417) to prevent cruelty to certain animals in the District of Columbia.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 5498) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Albany, Ga.;

A bill (H. R. 8335) to amend an act entitled "An act to determine the sessions of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin," approved March 31, 1892, chapter 28;

A bill (H. R. 9648) to amend the first section of an act providing that the circuit court of appeals for the fifth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, approved January 13, 1903; and

A bill (H. R. 10145) to provide for appeals, writs of error, and other appelate proceedings from the circuit and district courts of Beaumont, in the eastern district of Texas.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 79) for the transportation of Porto Rican teachers to the United States and return was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN DISTRICT BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there have come from the House of Representatives five bills relating to the District of Columbia. Similar measures have been reported favorably from the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate. I wish simply to make a statement, occupying a moment, to show the difference between the two Houses in the matter of dealing with District legislation.

In the other House two days in each month are given for the consideration of District legislation, while here no such rule applies. So in getting through legislation for the District we have to take our chance of reaching a bill on the Calendar or calling it up by request. I desire to ask that these five bills may be given consideration at the present time, subject to objection. If objection be made, they will then be referred to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent——

Mr. SPOONER. Have they all been reported here?

Mr. GALLINGER. Similar bills have been reported.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not ask the Senate to agree that these bills shall be before it for consideration without any of us having an opportunity to examine them.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator from Texas that similar bills are on the Calendar of the Senate, reported some time ago by the Senate committee.

Mr. SPOONER. And these are to be taken up subject to objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; subject to objection.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is not now asking unanimous consent for their consideration?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all, unless the Senate shall agree to consider them.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of five House District bills.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. It looks like I am going to get lost in the shuffle to-day. I had a resolution which came over, and I gave way to let the two speeches, these eloquent and magnificent specimens of oratory to which we have just listened, be made. It is now so late that I do not know whether the subject I have on hand can well be disposed of to-day; but in order to get a chance to bring it up to-morrow, if the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to introduce another resolution and ask for its immediate consideration, he can then object, and it will go over and I can call it up in the morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I can not resist that appeal.

RECESS APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. TILLMAN. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which will be read for information.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas Article II, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States provides:

"The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint * * * all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law;"

And further:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of the session;"

And

Whereas it is known that certain officers appointed during the recess of Congress from March 4 last to November 9, and whose appointments were not confirmed by the Senate, are now in possession of and exercising the powers and functions of said offices: Be it

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of the Senate be, and it is hereby, authorized and instructed to report to the Senate—

First. What constitutes a "recess of the Senate," and what are the powers and limitations of the Executive in making appointments in such cases.

Second. What legislation is necessary to prevent the holding of an office by any person or persons whose commissions issue or are held by Executive exercise of unlawful authority, if any there be.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Let the resolution go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go over under the rule.

VINCENZO GERARDI.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Sentator from New Hampshire, that the five bills referred to by him be taken up for consideration, subject to objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill (H. R. 4344) for the relief of Vincenzo Gerardi, of Washington, D. C., was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all real estate lying in the District of Columbia heretofore purchased and conveyed to Vincenzo Gerardi, of said District, prior to the passage of this act, be relieved and exempted from the operation of an act entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens," approved March 3, 1887, and all forfeitures incurred by force of said act are in respect of such real estate hereby remitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BAILEY. I should like some explanation of this measure. Really, I had supposed that the request was that all these bills should remain on the Calendar, subject to be called up and still subject to objection. That is what I had supposed to be the request preferred by the Senator from New Hampshire a moment ago.

Mr. GALLINGER. My request, I will say, Mr. President, was that consent should be given for their consideration, subject to objection. If objection was made, they would then be referred to the committee from which similar bills have been reported.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that similar bills are on the Calendar, reported from the Senate committee?

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely similar bills.

Mr. BAILEY. With favorable reports, of course?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course.

Mr. BAILEY. It would seem a little ungracious for a Senator, because he does not know anything about a bill, to object to its consideration when a similar measure has been reported by the committee having the subject in charge, and I am not going to object.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course I expected to make a brief explanation if any Senator wished it.

For instance, in relation to this bill I will say that we have passed quite a number of bills to accomplish the same purpose in other cases. A man, who was an alien, came into possession of certain property here. He has since become naturalized, and the bill simply waives the statute which provides that aliens shall shall not hold property in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAILEY. If he is naturalized, he would hardly be within the statute.

Mr. GALLINGER. He acquired the property while an alien.

Mr. BAILEY. I am inclined to think that if he was a citizen before an action was instituted by the Government to forfeit the property the Government could not forfeit it; that the character of the defendant at the time the suit was instituted would determine the power of the Government to forfeit.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know that in this and quite a number of similar cases it has been held that legislation was necessary; and, of course, legislation can do no harm if the Senator's contention is correct. I will not——

Mr. BAILEY. The Government must allege the disability of an alien; and, mark you, it is not merely a disability existing when the defendant acquired the title, but it is a disability that must exist when the Government institutes the suit, because the Government might never institute the suit under the law. Still, of course, it can do no harm to give this man double protection. But I venture to say that there is some reason outside of that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the reason may be found in the last line or two of the bill, if it may be read again. It is barely possible that that is one reason.

The Secretary again read the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. There have been forfeitures not only incurred, but declared.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is it exactly.

Mr. BAILEY. It is practically a proposition to give it back to him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill, which will be indefinitely postponed.

The bill (S. 3597) for the relief of Vincenzo Gerardi, of Washington, D. C., was indefinitely postponed.

PUBLIC RESERVATION NO. 32.

The bill (H. R. 8688) to transfer jurisdiction of reservation No. 32, in the city of Washington, D. C., was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the jurisdiction and control of public reservation No. 32, bounded by Pennsylvania avenue, Fourteenth street, E street, and Thirteen-and-a-half street NW., in the city of Washington, D. C., is hereby transferred from the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in order to provide a suitable approach to the new District building to be located fronting said reservation.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 2885) to transfer jurisdiction and control over reservation No. 32 in the city of Washington, D. C., was indefinitely postponed.

REMOVAL OF SNOW AND ICE.

The bill (H. R. 10421) to provide for the removal of snow and ice from the sidewalks of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was read the first and second time by its title, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 3600) to provide for the removal of snow and ice from the sidewalks of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was indefinitely postponed.

SECTION 895 OF THE DISTRICT CODE.

The bill (H. R. 8686) to amend section 895 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 895 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia is hereby amended by adding the following to the first paragraph thereof:

"SEC. 895. Every vessel coming to anchor in any other portion of the navigable waters in the District of Columbia shall also be so moored under the direction of the harbor master, or the pilot of the police boat acting in the harbor master's absence, as not to obstruct the channel, and be secured with an anchor at bow and stern as to keep the long axis of the vessel parallel with that of the channel and prevent it from swinging so as to obstruct the free passage of the channel by other vessels."

SEC. 2. That the provision in the third paragraph of said section requiring "any captain or owner of or any one in charge of any barge, sand scow, or any vessel that may sink in said canals, shall raise and remove the same in five days," is hereby made applicable to the captain or owner of any sunken vessel or other structure in any dock or at the end of any wharf in the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 2884) to amend section 895 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia was indefinitely postponed.

LICENSES FOR BATH ESTABLISHMENTS.

The bill (H. R. 10669) to regulate the issue of licenses for Turkish, Russian, or medicated baths in the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 30 of section 7 of "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"PAR. 30. That owners or managers of massage establishments and Turkish, Russian, or medicated baths shall pay a license tax of $25 per annum: Provided, That no license shall be issued under this paragraph without the approval of the major and superintendent of police: Provided further, That it shall be unlawful for any female to give or administer massage treatment or any bath to any person of the male sex, or for any person of the male sex to give or administer massage treatment or any bath to any person of the female sex, in any establishment licensed under this paragraph. Any person violating the provisions of this paragraph shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than $40 nor more than $100 for each offense, or by imprisonment for not less than thirty nor more than ninety days, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and, in addition to such penalty, it shall be the duty of the assessor to revoke the license of the owner or manager of the establishment wherein the provisions of this paragraph shall have been violated."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to amend the bill by striking out, in lines 9 and 10, page 1, the words "massage establishments and." The next section of the code provides for their regulation, and these words ought not to be in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe some Senators desire an executive session. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 3, 1904, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 2, 1904.

CONSUL-GENERAL.

John Fowler, of Massachusetts, now consul at that place, to be consul-general of the United States at Chefoo, China.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

William H. Armbrecht, of Alabama, to be United States attorney for the southern district of Alabama.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

John Q. Walton, a first assistant engineer, to be a chief engineer, with the rank of first lieutenant, in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States.

Horatio N. Wood, a first assistant engineer, to be a chief engineer, with the rank of first lieutenant, in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States.

Percy W. Thompson, a first lieutenant, to be a captain in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States.

Walker W. Joynes, a second lieutenant, to be a first lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States.

POSTMASTERS.

MINNESOTA.

Ira C. Richardson to be postmaster at Thief River Falls, in the county of Red Lake and State of Minnesota.

MISSISSIPPI.

William B. Martin to be postmaster at Indianola, in the county of Sunflower and State of Mississippi.

MISSOURI.

Samuel R. Durham to be postmaster at Piedmont, in the county of Wayne and State of Missouri.

James M. Freeman to be postmaster at Shelbyville, in the county of Shelby and State of Missouri.

Thomas L. Howden to be postmaster at Skidmore, in the county of Nodaway and State of Missouri.

Clarence M. Zeigle to be postmaster at Bunceton, in the county of Cooper and State of Missouri.

NEW YORK.

Delano D. Cottrell to be postmaster at North Cohocton, in the county of Steuben and State of New York.

Charles H. Griffin to be postmaster at Oakfield, in the county of Genesee and State of New York.

Henry P. Wilcox to be postmaster at Cohocton, in the county of Steuben and State of New York.

Peter H. Zimmerman to be postmaster at Wayland, in the county of Steuben and State of New York.

TEXAS.

Charles R. Bone to be postmaster at Beaumont, in the county of Jefferson and State of Texas.

B. M. Sheldon to be postmaster at Rockport, in the county of Aransas and State of Texas.

WISCONSIN.

Dean J. Hotchkiss to be postmaster at Foxlake, in the county of Dodge and State of Wisconsin.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 2, 1904.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER TO THE UNITED STATES FROM PORTO RICO.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XII of the House of Representatives be amended by adding thereto the following as section 2:

"The Resident Commissioner to the United States shall possess the same powers and privileges as to committee service and in the House as are possessed by Delegates, and shall be competent to serve on the Committee on Insular Affairs as an additional member."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I read in Rule XVII, on page 279, the following:

It shall be in order, pending the motion for, or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain a motion to recommit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee.

Now, I wish, pending the motion for the previous question, to move that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman from Mississippi can not take me from the floor to make a motion; and even if he could, a motion to recommit a report of the Committee on Rules is not in order at any time. But suffice it to say that I have the floor, and the gentleman is not entitled to it at this time. I insist on my motion for the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I was making a parliamentary inquiry and telling the Chair what I wished to do.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman can not take me off the floor to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. We can make a parliamentary inquiry in the gentleman's time; certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. I think not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is in order under the rules that govern the Democratic convention, anyhow. [Great laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not obliged to answer parliamentary inquiries touching a matter that is not before the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DALZELL. I insist on my motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then I come right under Rule XVII to offer, pending a motion for the previous question, a motion to recommit.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman has not the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And I do offer the motion to recommit, with the following instructions.

Mr. DALZELL. I insist that the gentleman is not entitled to the floor, and in my time, to make a motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule on the motion made. The gentleman from Mississippi rises in his place and proposes, as the Chair gathers his meaning, a motion to recommit this resolution to the committee with instructions, claiming the right to offer that motion at this time, pending a motion for the previous question.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, then, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to recommit is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, I want to be heard on the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the Speaker of the House to the following ruling:

On April 11, 1900, the House was considering a resolution, reported from the Committee on Rules, providing time and conditions for consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues for the relief of the island of Porto Rico, and for other purposes," with Senate amendments.

The previous question having been ordered on the resolution, Mr. JAMES D. RICHARDSON, of Tennessee, moved to recommit with instructions.

Mr. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order against the motion.

Speaker Henderson said:

"The Chair will state that on the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee there has been a conflict of rulings. Some Speakers have held that the motion was in order, and others have held that the motion is not in order. Speaker Crisp has held that the motion was not in order. Speaker Reed has admitted it. The present Chair is clearly of the opinion that a rule reported by the Committee on Rules, upon which the previous question is ordered, is not subject to a motion to recommit, and therefore overrules the motion."

And I call the attention of the Speaker to this ruling, also made by Speaker Henderson:

On May 31, 1900, the previous question had been ordered on a resolution reported from the Committee on Rules relating to the consideration of House resolution 138, proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to trusts, and H. R. 10530, to amend the law relating to unlawful restraints and monopolies.

The question being on agreeing to the resolution, Mr. JAMES D. RICHARDSON, of Tennessee, proposed a motion to recommit the resolution with instructions.

Mr. JOHN DALZELL made the point of order against the motion.

The Speaker sustained the point of order, saying:

"The Chair has ruled in this session on this question, following the ruling of Speaker Crisp, who made the ruling distinctively * * * The Chair will say that he has thoroughly examined all of these authorities; that he did so before making the ruling he made in the early part of the session, and therefore the Chair follows the ruling that he then made. The Chair will hear arguments when the Chair has not made up his mind and is in doubt, but when his mind is clear, of course there is no use in making arguments and unnecessarily taking up the time of the House."

The same Speaker on another occasion, to which I will refer, declined to entertain the motion to recommit.

On February 17, 1902, Mr. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following:

"Resolved, That immediately on the adoption of this rule, and immediately after the reading of the Journal on each day thereafter until the bill hereinafter mentioned shall have been disposed of, the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of the bill (H. R. 10530) to repeal war-revenue taxation, and for other purposes; that on February 18, at 4 o'clock p. m., general debate shall be closed in Committee of the Whole, when the committee shall rise and report the bill with such amendments as have been recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means, and immediately the House shall vote, without debate or intervening motion, on the several amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the engrossment and third reading, and (if the bill shall have passed to be engrossed and read a third time) on the final passage. General leave to print is granted for ten days from February 18 on the bill (H. R. 10530)."

The previous question having been ordered, Mr. JAMES D. RICHARDSON, of Tennessee, moved to recommit the resolution with certain instructions.

The Speaker declined to entertain the motion to recommit, announcing that in respect to this question he would be governed by the ruling of Mr. Speaker Crisp.

Mr. RICHARDSON having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table—yeas 166, nays 123.

And I will ask the Clerk to read the ruling of Speaker Crisp, to be found in Mr. Hinds's Parliamentary Precedents, section 1553.

The Clerk read as follows;

On March 28, 1894, the previous question had been ordered on a resolution reported from the Committee on Rules, fixing times for the consideration of the contested election cases of O'Neill v. Joy, from Missouri, and English v. Hilborn, from California.

Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, moved to recommit the pending resolution to the Committee on Rules with instruction to so modify the resolution that an additional vote might be had in the Joy case on the question of ordering a new election if the House should determine that the facts required one, and with instruction to allow a suitable time for discussion.

Mr. Joseph H. Outhwaite, of Ohio, made the point of order that a motion to recommit a report of the Committee on Rules was not now in order.

The Speaker sustained the point of order, holding as follows:

"In the first place, ordinarily, under all parliamentary rules with which the Chair has any acquaintance, except the system under which we are now operating, a motion to recommit is not in order after the previous question is demanded or ordered. A motion to recommit is simply another method of permitting the House to amend, and under ordinary rules the right of amendment is cut off by the previous question. The House has, however, a provision in its rules that even pending the demand for the previous question, or after it is ordered, a motion to recommit may be in order.

"Rule XI provides that 'It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and pending the consideration thereof the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said report shall have been fully disposed of.'

"Now, the purpose of the rule, as disclosed by the language which has been read, was that on reports from the Committee on Rules the House should have the right, without delay and without motions tending to delay, to dispose of such a report. The language is similar to that used in reference to motions to suspend the rules, and the Chair is aware that there may be some embarrassment at times because of the distinction between a report from the Committee on Rules and a motion to suspend the rules. But take the case now before the House. The Chair has no doubt that it is within the power of the House to amend a report from the Committee on Rules. The Chair has never entertained any doubt about that. If the House should vote down the demand for the previous question, then this report could be amended.

"The idea that the Chair has always had in enforcing this new rule was so to construe it as to permit the House to vote without delay upon the final proposition, either as reported by the committee or as agreed upon by the House, if the House should choose to amend it.

"Now, the House has ordered the previous question. What does the previous question mean? It means that the House shall proceed to vote upon the proposition on which it is ordered. If a motion to recommit is in order, perhaps a motion to lay on the table might be in order; and the effect of both these motions, whatever the motive of the mover might be, would be to delay the House in reaching a final vote on the proposition before it, and on which the House has expressed a desire for a final vote by ordering the previous question. The Chair has always held, in construing the rule, that any motion which would tend to prevent the House from a speedy vote upon the final proposition is not in order.

"The Chair holds that on a report from the Committee on Rules, when the previous question has been ordered, it is not in order to move to recommit to the committee. The Chair thus holds the more willingly because the matter is entirely in the power of the House. If the House desires to amend or alter in any respect a report of this character, it need only vote down a demand for the previous question, and then the whole field of amendment is open; the report can be altered in any way to suit the wishes of the House.

"In other words, the Chair accepts the ordering of the previous question as an expression of the desire of the majority of the House to vote upon the resolution as it stood when the previous question was called upon it. Therefore the Chair holds that the motion to recommit is not in order."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, these rulings, in my judgment, are conclusive against the right of the gentleman from Mississippi to recommit.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the ruling of Speaker Crisp as it was read from the Clerk's desk, and, if the Chair noted it, it was based, all of it, upon two things. First, that the previous question had already been ordered when the motion was made, and, secondly, that the resolution from the Committee on Rules was a resolution which demanded that a certain vote should be taken without delay or intervening motion.

Now, that is not the case with the resolution before us now, and I purposely did not wait until after the previous question had been called, but made the motion pending the call of the previous question. Speaker Crisp says that he never denied the power of the House to amend, but "after the previous question had been ordered" upon a rule, which rule set forth that a certain vote was to be taken "without delay or intervening motion," that then the difficulty was to get at the rule without voting down the previous question, which had not been done. He says, to quote his language again: "When the previous question has been ordered, it is not in order to move to recommit."

I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that Speaker Crisp's ruling upon that case was based principally upon the language of the rule which had then been brought in. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no such thing as was in that rule here. There is no such spirit about this rule at all. This rule is simply as follows:

That Rule XII of the House of Representatives be amended by adding thereto the following, etc.

Now, the rule does not say "and that thereupon the previous question shall be ordered," or "that a vote shall be taken without delay," or "without intervening motion." It does not say anything except simply what is contained in the resolution. It comes to this House like a resolution from any other committee. I take it that the Committee on Rules when it presents a simple resolution to amend or add certain language, as far as that resolution is concerned, has no higher standing in the House than a resolution worded exactly the same way from any other committee. Now, the Committee on Rules could have inserted in this resolution a resolution to the further effect that it should be considered at once. There have been precedents in the House which they could have followed to that effect, and this language might have been added to the rule, that it should be considered at once "without intervening motion."

I want to call the Chair's attention to this other language where Speaker Crisp is quoted, and the Chair will find that it turns principally upon what the word "dilatory" means. It is said that—

It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and, pending the consideration, the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result is announced, he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania with his intellectual integrity, will not contend for one moment that there is anything dilatory in intent or purpose or fact in the motion before the House now—the motion to recommit with instructions.

But it is "no other dilatory motion, even of the highest privilege." Pending the consideration before the Committee on Rules, the question of consideration of bills has been ruled out of order when dilatory, whenever, in the opinion of the Speaker of the House, they were dilatory. Now, Mr. Speaker, this motion that I make to recommit to the Committee on Rules with instructions to bring in a resolution with the amendments which are stated here is of a substantive character and is in no sense dilatory at all, and the motion is made pending the motion for the previous question, and it is made upon a resolution which contains no language at all as to procedure, but merely contains the legislative language intended to be enacted.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, just one word. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has utterly misconceived the rulings I have already cited to the Chair. They were all made upon resolutions that contained no method of procedure at all—plain, simple resolutions.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker Crisp says that they were to "proceed to the vote without delay."

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, well, that is part of Mr. Speaker Crisp's opinion; but the rulings were made upon resolutions that had no reference to procedure at all; plain resolutions that brought certain bills on the Calendar before the House for consideration. At all events, it makes no difference whether before or after——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, just one word. I dislike very much to differ with the gentleman in a matter of memory, because as a rule his memory is much more accurate as to details than mine. I have not this morning seen the motion upon which Mr. Speaker Crisp was ruling, but my recollection is that it was one of those rulings which we brought in very frequently in the Fifty-third Congress—had to, because of the difficulty of holding a quorum here—and was that "without intervening motions" and "without delay," we were to "proceed to a vote," and I think if the gentleman examines the resolution he will find that to be the case. That is my recollection of what then occurred.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is mistaken, but whether that be so or not, the other three cases I set forth, where the r ulings were made, were simply resolutions from the Committee on Rules, bringing the House to a vote upon a certain bill pending on the Calendar; so that the gentleman's argument, based on that proposition, is entirely aside from the question. At all events, it makes very little difference one way or the other. Rule XVI provides for the order in which motions shall be submitted to the House. It reads as follows:

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lay on the table, for the previous question (which motions shall be decided without debate), to postpone to a certain day, to refer, or to amend, or postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order, etc.

So that it seems to me I am entitled to have put to the House my motion for the previous question at this time, and if the House votes the previous question then it is utterly immaterial, because the gentleman's proposition will be out of order under the ruling.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the last remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] pertinent. It is true that under clause 4 of Rule XVI, "when a motion is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lay on the table, for the previous question," etc. But Rule XVII tells what can be done when one of these motions is made, to wit, a motion for the previous question. A motion for the previous question is one of the questions in order under Rule XVI, and under Rule XVII we are told what can be done when it is made, and amongst other things, we are told, is that "pending the motion, the Speaker may entertain a motion to recommit," etc.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] moves to recommit the bill with instructions, pending a motion for the previous question. Rule XVII provides:

It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain and submit the motion to recommit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee.

Section 4 of Rule XIV, as to resolutions, conflicts with this rule. The Chair has been called upon already at this session of Congress to rule upon a motion to recommit a resolution, and held, somewhat reluctantly, that it was in order to make the motion as to a resolution the same as to a bill, and the Chair stated at the time that the rules might well have been construed together and one applied to a resolution and another to a bill.

But owing to the precedents, which were quite numerous and which the Chair carefully examined, the Chair held that Rule XVII applied to resolutions as well as to bills, and that it was in order to move to recommit a resolution pending the motion for the previous question. Now, the gentleman moves to recommit pending a motion for the previous question. Ordinarily this motion would be in order, but as to reports from the Committee on Rules it is well settled by a ruling made by Mr. Speaker Crisp and by three rulings following that of Mr. Speaker Crisp, made by Mr. Speaker Henderson (the last one being appealed from and the House by a decided majority sustaining the ruling), that reports from the Committee on Rules are exceptional and that the same rule does not apply to those reports as applies to reports from other committees.

Some gentlemen may say that this ruling is not logical. Examining it, however, in the light of Rule XI, which has been read, the Chair is inclined to hold that it is logical. But let that be as it may, the rules are what the House construes them to be; and this rule of construction having been given first by Mr. Speaker Crisp in a matter of very considerable importance, and followed in three different rulings of Mr. Speaker Henderson, and affirmed by the House on a yea-and-nay vote by a decided majority, the Chair feels that it is his duty to follow the precedents, and therefore holds that the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi is not in order.

Mr. DALZELL. I ask the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, there being on a division (called for by Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi)—ayes 111, noes 104.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take just long enough to explain what this report of the Committee on Rules is. In the original legislation relating to Porto Rico provision was made not for a Delegate, but for a Resident Commissioner. When he came here, of course he was not entitled to the privileges of the floor, and it was very inconvenient for Members of the House to be called out from time to time to confer with him, and it was inconvenient for him to be obliged to conduct his official business outside of the House. Therefore, in the last Congress a rule was adopted admitting the Resident Commissioner to the privileges of the floor.

Being on the floor, however, he is not entitled in his present situation either to speak or to serve on a committee. To mend that this resolution extends to him all the rights and privileges, so far as the House and the committees of the House are concerned, that belong to a Delegate from a Territory. It is entirely proper, in the judgment of the Committee on Rules, that this Commissioner should have the rights and privileges proposed to be conferred.

The people of Porto Rico are entitled to have these rights and privileges bestowed upon their Commissioner; and, of course, it will be very much to the advantage of the Members of the House, when called upon to legislate for Porto Rico, that they should be brought in contact with a person having the rights of a Delegate. Those are the reasons that justified the committee, as they thought, in reporting this rule.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state at the outset that if nothing better than is proposed by this resolution can be done in the shape of legislation with regard to the position of this nondescript official, known to the statutes of our country at present as the "Resident Commissioner" to the United States from Porto Rico, we on this side want at least that much done.

In so far as the resolution improves the condition of the Commissioner Resident to the United States from the island of Porto Rico it is good legislation. Our objection to it is only that it does not go far enough, and we desired, by amendment or a motion, to recommit with instructions, to get to the right point, to obtain more than partial, full justice.

There is no reason, Mr. Speaker, why the island of Porto Rico should not have upon this floor every power and privilege and advantage which the island of Hawaii has. There is no reason why the gentleman who now represents Porto Rico here as a Resident Commissioner should not be a Delegate as much as the gentleman who now represents the islands of Hawaii. And when I say that, Mr. Speaker, I am speaking in no partisan sense, because I hold in my hand a bill which has been carefully considered by the Committee on Insular Affairs, reported to this House, and is now upon the Calendar with a favorable report—a bill (H. R. 3540) "to provide for a Delegate in the House of Representatives of the United States from Porto Rico."

Mr. JONES of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Is it not a fact that the House of Representatives in the last Congress unanimously passed that identical bill——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am glad to be reminded of that fact.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. And the very gentlemen who now report this rule voted for it?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am glad the gentleman reminds me of that fact. It is true that the House of Representatives in the Fifty-seventh Congress—whether unanimously or not I do not now remember—did pass a bill to provide a Delegate for the island of Porto Rico on this floor.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman tell the House what became of that bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It died in the Senate, I suppose.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no; it did not die in the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will tell what became of it, if the gentleman from Mississippi will yield.

Mr. DALZELL. I can tell what became of it. It was a bill entitled "An act to provide for a Delegate in the House of Representatives of the United States from Porto Rico." It passed the House of Representatives without a dissenting voice, and the Senate sent it back to us with these amendments, which I will read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission of three persons, whose duty it shall be to make careful investigation into titles and claims, legal and equitable, of the Holy Roman Catholic Church in and to any and all real property situate within Porto Rico, and claimed, respectively, by said church and the Government of the United States or the government of Porto Rico or any local or municipal government thereof"——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman need not read it all. I have very short time, you know.

Mr. DALZELL. I will yield to you my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. All right.

Mr. DALZELL. That is part of the first paragraph of a Senate amendment to a bill to create a Delegate from Porto Rico. The second is—

That all the applicable provisions of the naturalization laws of the United States shall apply to and be held to authorize the admission to citizenship of all persons not citizens who owe permanent allegiance to the United States—

And so on. That is the second paragraph of the Senate amendment. Now, the third paragraph amendment is—

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, empowered to authorize the construction or extension of any wharf, pier, dolphin, boom, weir, breakwater, sea wall, bulkhead, jetty, or other structure on any lands belonging to the United States—

And so forth. That is the fate that the bill that this House passed giving Porto Rico a Delegate met at the other end of this Capitol, and gentlemen who are opposing the adoption of this rule, which gives something tangible, are proposing simply the consideration of a bill that would probably meet the same fate that this bill met in the last Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the conduct of the Republican Senate has been worse than I thought it was. [Laughter.] I had the idea that they had allowed the bill to "die a-borning" because they did not want to do justice to Porto Rico; but it seems that in addition to that they wanted to do a great many other things, which, in the opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, would be altogether wrong, and in my opinion would be altogether wrong, too, if I had time to examine it, among other things, to appoint by the President, "with the advice and consent of the Senate," a Delegate on the floor of the House.

The gentleman's argument, Mr. Speaker, reminds me of an anecdote that Zeb Vance, of North Carolina, used to tell. He says there was an Irish landlord who sent a message to his agent, "Collect the rents." The agent sent back word, "It is physically impossible to collect the rents. I have now three bullet holes through my hat, two through my coat, and one through the seat of my trousers." [Laughter.] Immediately upon receipt of that, a message went back from the landlord, "Collect the rents. They can not scare me by shooting at you." [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania can not scare me by shooting at a Republican Senate. That is all right. I shall heartily join him. [Laughter.]

Now, I was going on to say, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution, reported by the Committee on Rules, reads as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XII of the Rules of the House of Representatives be amended by adding thereto the following:

"The Resident Commissioner to the United States from Porto Rico shall possess the same powers and privileges as to committee service and in the House as are possessed by Delegates, and shall be competent to serve on the Committee on Insular Affairs as an additional member."

Now, what we proposed to do upon this side was to amend it so that it should read as follows; mark me and follow me closely, and I believe that if we could have gotten it before the House it would have passed, and I believe that the reason why we can not get it before the House promptly is the fear that it would pass. Understand me, I do not mean that that is the reason why the Speaker has ruled as he did. When the Speaker gave his ruling, he satisfied me that from the standpoint of parliamentary law precedents, at any rate, his ruling was correct. I am not criticising him, but I hardly believe that the previous question would have been called and the right to amend shut off unless there had been some fear among leading Republicans that the House would pass what we wanted. And this was what we wanted:

Motion to recommit to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to bring in the following:

"Resolved, That the third Tuesday of February"—

Or any other day, that would make no difference; we had to fix a day, of course, in the resolution—

"immediately after the morning hour, be fixed for the consideration of H. R. 3540, entitled 'A bill to provide for a Delegate in the House of Representatives of the United States from Porto Rico'—

That being the bill which has been reported, and I believe, although I am not certain of that, reported unanimously by the Committee on Insular Affairs, a large majority of whom are Republicans. It was merely that there should be a day fixed for that. Then our amendment goes on—

"and that after two hours' general debate on a side and consideration under the five-minute rule a vote shall be taken upon the bill and pending amendments.

"Resolved further, That in the meantime Rule XII of the Rules of the House of Representatives be amended by adding thereto the following: 'The Resident Commissioner to the United States from Porto Rico shall possess the same powers and privileges as to committee service and in the House as are possessed by Delegates, and shall be competent to serve on the Committee on Insular Affairs as an additional member.'"

In other words, we simply ask, in addition to the resolution from the Committee on Rules, that a day shall be fixed for the consideration of a bill that is upon the Calendar for consideration, reported by the Insular Committee, which stands eleven Republicans to six Democrats, and, if I am not misinformed, unanimously reported by that committee. I am informed that I am not misinformed upon that subject. We merely ask that a day may be fixed for the consideration of that bill and that in the meanwhile, beginning now, the resolution which has been brought in here from the Committee on Rules, designating and fixing the standing, powers, and privileges of the Resident Commissioner shall be passed and be our rule of conduct, but that after that time he should become a Delegate, and that Porto Rico, nearer to us and more like us, more geographically bound up with our destinies, should have given to her the same power and privilege and advantage of representation upon this floor as Hawaii has. We might, perhaps, not be able to have from Porto Rico so variegated a succession of Delegates; we might not have some of those curious names out of Tooke's Pantheon, which are common to the population of Hawaii; but I think the people of Porto Rico are just as fully competent to elect a Delegate here as are the people of Hawaii, and especially when under the previous legislation which has come from the Committee on Insular Affairs and become a part of the law of the land only the intelligent part of the population of Porto Rico can vote for a Delegate.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not better, in view of the fate that our bill met last year at the other end of the Capitol, that we pass this resolution and later pass the Delegate bill also?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My friend takes it for granted—and I as a Democrat never did that—that if the Republican Senate does make a fool of itself it is going to keep on forever. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I do not think it necessary that they will conclude to introduce that substitute for this bill that they did last time, and especially when they found that their substitute did not go down with the House of Representatives. All I ask now is that a day be fixed when this bill shall be considered, and if considered, I think it will be passed, because I think the Members of the Fifty-seventh Congress, with the changes of membership—a large proportion of those constitute the membership of the Fifty-eighth Congress who voted for that measure—will vote for it again.

How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wish to give nine minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, if he desires it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is there any other Member on this side who desires to speak? I will yield to any other Member. I shall reserve the nine minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I suggest to the gentleman that he use his time, as we are entitled to close on this side.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I know that you are. Have you more than one you wish to put in to speak? If you have, put one in now.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. We will vote for your resolution.

Mr. DALZELL. Thank you.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the last Congress passed a resolution giving the Commissioner from the island of Porto Rico the privilege of the floor. The pending proposition will confer upon him the right to introduce bills, the right to speak, the right to representation upon committees. It confers upon him, as I understand it, all the rights of Delegates from the Territories, excepting the right of a private secretary and the right of mileage. If I am correctly informed, if this amendment is made the Commissioner shall have all other rights and privileges of a Delegate except a private secretary and the right to receive mileage.

Now, the Committee on Insular Affairs in the last Congress reported a bill creating a Delegate for the island of Porto Rico, and the House passed the bill. But it failed to become a law. The Committee on Insular Affairs during the present session of this Congress has reported a similar bill, and it is now on the Calendar.

But that bill has no connection with the present proposition, which is a proposition to amend the rules. The House has control of its own rules. It has the right to admit to the floor, the right to admit to discussion and to membership upon committees a representation from each of the outlying Territories as it chooses. It can do that without the consent and cooperation of the other branch of the legislative department of the Government, and it can confer this right immediately. We can confer upon the island of Porto Rico a substantial benefit now, without delay, and it is the object of the Committee on Rules to grant that right, and it does not interfere with the subsequent right of the House and the subsequent power of Congress to grant a Delegate to the island of Porto Rico. It does not exclude the right to pass subsequent legislation; but it is the purpose of this side of the House to confer this benefit upon the people of Porto Rico, and it seems to be the object of the other side of the House, judging from the remarks of its leader, to further illustrate the incorrigible cussedness of the Republican Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question for information?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. You may.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman himself believe that if this resolution is passed that the bill which came from the Committee on Insular Affairs providing a Delegate from Porto Rico will ever be considered at this session of Congress?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I believe it will.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. You do?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have no reason to believe otherwise. It was considered in the last House, but I fear if it shall be considered and pass the House again it will be many, many months before it will ultimately become a law, and if that apprehension be well grounded it will be many months before any advantage would come to the people of Porto Rico by virtue of that measure and now we have the opportunity to confer upon them immediate benefits.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but if he will allow me just a moment—I dislike to use up his time—but the gentleman clearly did not catch the drift of the proposed amendment. We do not propose to prevent the Resident Commissioner from getting the advantages proposed under this resolution immediately. We say, merely, that a certain day shall be fixed for the consideration of the bill, and now, if the gentleman will give me his attention, we say then in the meantime the Delegate shall be given exactly those advantages proposed by this resolution brought in from the Committee on Rules, so that he has not to wait, and the gentleman's remark to the effect that he would in the meantime be deprived of the advantages which you propose to confer on him now is unfounded.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is an attempt, it seems to me, to load up the resolution with something that will possibly defeat its passage. I can not construe it in any other way. This is a plain proposition, and the gentleman's resolution or his motion to fix a time for the consideration of the bill giving to the island of Porto Rico a Delegate may come up on suspension day or under a number of other ways. There is no necessary connection between the two propositions. This is a temporary matter and will operate immediately. We can do this now, and ought to do it untrammeled, and therefore I can see no reason why the rule should be recommitted or anything attached to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I introduced the bill to which the gentleman from Mississippi has referred, giving to Porto Rico a Delegate on this floor. It was unanimously reported from the Committee on Insular Affairs. I introduced a similar bill in the Fifty-seventh Congress. It also was unanimously reported from the Committee on Insular Affairs and passed the House by a unanimous vote. I am still in favor of the enactment of that bill into law. But I am also in favor at this time of the passage of the pending resolution reported by the Committee on Rules. The bill which went through the House in the Fifty-seventh Congress met in the Senate the fate described by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is possible, if not probable, that to-day a similar bill would meet a similar fate in that body.

However, the passage of this resolution amending the rule will not prevent the passage of the bill through the House at a later day. I therefore think that it will be the part of wisdom to pass the resolution amending the rule without regard to what may be the ultimate fate of the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, Porto Rico, with a million of inhabitants, is as much entitled to representation by a Delegate on this floor as is Hawaii, with less than two hundred thousand——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman how it would hurt this proposition to amend the rule by coupling with it the proposition to set the bill down for consideration by the House at an early day?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Because, if this resolution passes, the Delegate from Porto Rico will at once be given a seat on the floor with an opportunity to speak. He will also become a member of a House committee. He can voice the needs of his constituents and be questioned in open debate. If you wait until the passage of the bill, he may never be heard.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. This rule does not propose to wait until the passage of the bill; it gives him his rights immediately, but fixes an early date for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The resolution reported from the Committee on Rules does not go to the Senate at all, but it goes into operation at once; and all my amendment does is to fix a day for the consideration of the bill, so that the House can express its opinion, no matter what the Senate did. If the Senate acts as foolishly as it did last year, when it tried to make the President of the Senate appoint a Member of this House or a Delegate to this House, still the resolution would become effective immediately.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Committee on Insular Affairs will attend to the passage of the bill in good time. They are unanimous now in the opinion that the resolution should pass without delay.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RODEY].

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Speaker, on the 2d day of March, when the bill referred to by the speakers that have preceded me was under consideration, I spoke on the bill and said there was something pathetic in the Territories at that particular time trying to aid people in a worse condition than themselves. I would like, if I had time, to repeat those remarks here, but I will only take time to say that I believe there is a kindly feeling on behalf of the States represented in this House to grant the million people living in Porto Rico at least the full privilege of having a Delegate on this floor. Most of you gentlemen who represent great States do not stop to think that there are a million people down there on that island, which is more people than there are in some ten States of this Union. Most of you do not realize the position of the people in Porto Rico.

The Supreme Court of the United States the other day, in passing upon a question under the immigration laws, held that they were citizens only in a sense, that they were not subject to exclusion under the immigration laws; but the court did not go so far as to say that they were citizens. Now, that is an anomalous condition for a million people, who owe allegiance to the flag of this country, to be up in the air in that manner. I say that the House ought to do something, whether the Senate approves of it or not, to grant their Resident Commissioner the privileges of a Delegate, because this House, primarily, represents the people of the United States, and Congress ought to pass some sort of a law that will fix the status of these people. It will be an act of common justice.

People do not stop to consider the condition of the Territories. We in the West, being somewhat familiar with the vernacular of the cattle country, say that the people of the Territories are "mavericks." They never vote for President, for Vice-President, for a Senator or a Member of Congress, or for governor, solicitor-general, or any of their own officers as you do in the States, and not even for or against any law Congress passes for the Territories. It is the least privilege you can grant those people in Porto Rico to have a Delegate on the floor of the House. How can the House know the wants of those people unless they have a representative here. Citizens of the United States ought not to be left in that position. Now, I am glad to see that such a spirit prevails here, and if the same spirit will continue when the bill that the gentleman from Wisconsin says will come in onto the floor in a few weeks you will pass that as well, and do an act of common justice to the people you have taken under the flag of this nation. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will yield the gentleman a minute.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There was a question before the Supreme Court of the United States involving the citizenship of these people. I do not remember just the issue, but my recollection is that it was a question whether they were citizens of the United States. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Mexico if he remembers what the court decided?

Mr. RODEY. The court decided, as I have just stated, that they were not aliens in the sense of the immigration laws, not that that they were actually citizens——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Mexico has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is evidently mistaken about the import of the amendment which we propose to make. It would not, if passed, interfere in the slightest degree with the legislation proposed by the Republican members of the Committee on Rules. It merely agrees to pass that as a sort of interregnum legislation, to be maintained until it is altered or amended. It does not mix that up with the bill to give a Delegate to Porto Rico. It does not send the amendment or resolution of the Republican majority on rules to the Senate. It does not change it from the character of a House resolution to that of either a joint or concurrent resolution. It merely says that while we are willing in the meantime to adopt this amendment to Rule XII, and give "to the Resident Commissioner in the United States from Porto Rico the same powers and privileges as to committee service and in the House as are possessed by Delegates, and the right to be an additional member of the Committee on Insular Affairs," that we add a further resolution that a time shall be fixed for the consideration of the bill reported by the gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs.

I was myself a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs at the time that bill was adopted in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and I voted for it and advocated it in committee and on the floor. Now, does the gentleman mean to tell the country that he would have voted against an amendment to fix a day for the consideration of a bill from his own committee, and a bill which he advocated so warmly and for which he stood so stoutly? Ordinarily I do not prophesy, but I will venture a prediction here to-day. I predict that this is the very last legislation in this session of the Fifty-eighth, and probably in any session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, affecting the rights, powers, and duties of a "Resident Commissioner" or any other sort of representative from the island of Porto Rico.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I came in just before the Speaker began his ruling. I understood him to hold that the proposed amendment was out of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, he did; but I am calling the attention of the country now to the fact that the Speaker was forced to make that ruling by the call of the previous question upon the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who need not have called it if he had been willing that the House should have a chance to amend the pending resolution. He is standing there as a representative of the Republican majority on this floor when he calls for the previous question. He is outlining the policy of the Republican party upon this question, and he is outlining it in a way of giving partial justice to Porto Rico and a Representative here; he is outlining it in a way that looks to me as if full justice was not to be given now or hereafter.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Mississippi permit me to say one word?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I want this resolution passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. So do I, if we can not get anything better.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But I do not want this situation to arise: I do not want the bill to pass this House and——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is not a bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No, it is a resolution; but it can not be amended now, under the ruling of the Chair. I do not want to present a bill, have it go to the Senate, and there be pigeonholed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman totally misunderstands. The gentleman still does not comprehend me.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me to state my position?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No, sir; not in my time—yes, I will. The gentleman is so uniformly courteous that I can not resist.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This is what I wanted to say: My idea is that were the bill first to pass the House to-day, it would be pigeonholed in the Senate. Then, the bill being dead, I should be compelled to ask that a resolution like the one now pending be brought before the House, and the answer to my request would probably be: "Oh, no; you wanted the bill, now let us wait and see what the Senate is going to do with it." Thus we would get neither bill nor resolution, and there would be no chance for Porto Rico to have representation on this floor. I therefore think that it is better to pass this resolution, and thus at once secure to Porto Rico representation on this floor. Later we will see what can be done with the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why, none of the evils and troubles which the gentleman apprehends could possibly occur. The gentleman voted with the majority for the previous question. It is evident now that he did not understand the situation, else with his opinions he could not have so voted. If my resolution had been offered and had been adopted by the House, if my amendment had been adopted, he could not have said a thing in the world about its going to the Senate, about having the bill lie there and sleep, or having it amended.

All it would have done under the sun would have been this: It would have allowed now to the Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico, from the moment of the passage of this resolution, without any concurrence or necessity or opportunity of concurrence on the part of the Senate at all, without any reference to the Senate whatsoever, the committee powers and the right of speaking upon the floor which are allowed to a Delegate from any Territory.

Then it would have done only one other thing, and that would have been to fix a day for the consideration by the House of the bill H. R. 3540, the gentleman's own bill. If I have not made that clearly understood now, it is because I do not know how. It could not have mixed up in the Senate the bill which has been reported by the gentleman's committee with this resolution of the Committee on Rules at all. Nothing would have gone to the Senate. All it could possibly have done would have been in the resolution to have fixed a day for the consideration of a bill, and unless the gentleman gets a day the bill is never going to be considered, in my private opinion. I am not, of course, in the secrets of the majority, but I believe that this will be the full meed and measure of justice extended to Porto Rico.

Now, the rule is partial justice. It is much better than the present law, and I am going to vote for it, since the Chair has ruled that no amendments are in order. And every member of the Committee on Insular Affairs on the Democratic side is going to vote for it, because, if we can not get full justice and full rights for the representative of Porto Rico, we are willing to take partial justice and partial rights.

But how could this measure to give the representative of Porto Rico partial justice have been hurt by going beyond it and fixing a day for the consideration of your bill?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DALZELL. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the real question in this case is a practical one, not a theoretical one. The real question is, Which side of this House is running the machine of the House? The majority side of the Committee on Rules presents to you a plain, simple proposition looking to a change of one rule of the House so as to admit within the Hall of the House the Commissioner from Porto Rico and give him a place on one of the committees of the House. That is a change from the provision of the rule as it now stands. The other proposition is to combine not only the action of the House in amending its own rule, but to provide also for the action of the House and Senate jointly in the matter of the creation of a Delegate. Now, however any Member of the House may feel in regard to the question whether there ought to be a Delegate from Porto Rico or not, surely the membership of this House will not take out of the hands of the constituted organization of the House the question of the amendment and control of its own rules and allow it to be transferred to the other side of the Chamber for the purpose of creating a Delegate.

I want, however, to remind the gentlemen on the other side of the House that after all the talk we have heard here and all the talk that has been current throughout the country for a number of months attacking the Republican party for wishing to bring about a condition that ultimately will bring States into the Union from the insular possessions of the Government, we now find the other side of the House in the attitude of very zealously urging and pushing forward, apparently over the opinion of the majority of the Committee on Rules, a proposition looking ultimately to statehood for Porto Rico—at least a step in that direction. So that hereafter when our Democratic friends in this Chamber undertake——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GROSVENOR. In a moment.

When they undertake to charge the Republican party with wanting to fill the Senate Chamber and the House of Representatives with representatives of these people on the other side of the ocean, we will remind them gently of this first attempt to force a step in the direction of conferring statehood upon Porto Rico.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Of course the acquisition of California was in a certain way a step in the direction of making a State of it. But does the gentleman from Ohio contend that a vote for a Delegate from Porto Rico as well as one from Hawaii is a step in the direction of statehood? If this be so, then did the gentleman take a step in the direction of granting statehood to Hawaii when he voted for admitting a Delegate from Hawaii? Will the gentleman answer me those two questions?

Mr. GROSVENOR. To begin with, I did not do anything of that kind, as I now remember.

Now, let me say to the gentleman, in the little balance of time remaining to me, that I do not know what he means by talking about California and a Delegate from California. I never heard of a Territorial government in California. Such a fact, if it existed, escaped my knowledge; and I was old enough to understand it at the time it should have occurred. I have read many things——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Ohio has evidently misunderstood my suggestion. I said that the acquisition of the Territory of California was, as it proved, as much a step in the direction of statehood as the appointment of a Delegate would have been.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not say anything about California. California never had a Territorial organization.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Ohio said that giving Porto Rico a Delegate was a step in the direction of statehood, and I said that to some extent the acquisition of California was a step in the direction of statehood, but a vote for either did not mean for statehood.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My friend overlooks the great fact that his own party has constantly been driving at. We are not complaining of any step in the direction of forthcoming statehood of any Territory on this continent bounded by the oceans that surround us.

That is one question. That is a question about which we are all agreed. The real question that I am trying to make is the question of steps toward statehood of the insular possessions of the Government. That is my proposition.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have expended time uselessly. The question here is whether you will stand by this rule that apparently everybody is in favor of or whether you will mutilate it by a defeat of the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which would result in throwing open the whole question here to the amendment of the rule.

I think the House will stand by the report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico, Mr. DEGETAU, a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, with Mr. FOSTER of Vermont in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House under a special order for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

THOMAS J. COWARD.

The first business was the bill (H. R. 3875) for the relief of the estate of Dr. Thomas J. Coward, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of Dr. Thomas J. Coward, deceased, of Clinton, Tenn., the sum of $1,000, for medical services rendered by him as contract surgeon during the late war of the rebellion.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on War Claims, was read:

In line 7, strike out "$1,000" and insert "$326.66."

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I will state briefly the character of this claim.

Dr. Thomas J. Coward was employed by the officer commanding a post at Clinton, Tenn., during the war of the rebellion, to attend the sick at that post. He served one month and sixteen days at one time and one month and twenty-four days at another time and furnished all necessary medicines. The War Department found that he was entitled to $326.66, but disallowed the claim upon the ground that he was not employed by a competent military authority.

The rule of the Surgeon-General's Office at that time required that before a contract surgeon could be employed his employment must be sanctioned by the Surgeon-General.

This was a case of emergency, and it appears by the report of the War Department that this physician was employed by the officer commanding the post. He also furnished his own medicines. According to the report of the War Department his services would have entitled him to a compensation of $326.66 if the Surgeon-General had sanctioned his employment.

The circumstances were such that during the delay which would have been caused in sending to the Surgeon-General's Office for the requisite authority there would have been no one to attend the sick soldiers in the hospital. The emergency forbid this delay.

So the committee are unanimously of opinion that this is a meritorious claim, and ought to be allowed, and I move that we favorably report it.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

WARREN MITCHELL.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 1700) for the relief of the legal representatives of Warren Mitchell, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the legal representatives of Warren Mitchell, deceased, late of Louisville, Ky., the sum of $128,692.22, being proceeds of captured property and found to be in the Treasury by the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries a large sum of money, not money that belongs to the Government of the United States, but that has been held in the Treasury a long time, money belonging to this claimant. Being an important bill, the committee, after a long and tedious investigation, made a unanimously favorable report. I ask that that report be read, and that gentlemen give attention to the reading of it. I ask that it be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read in the gentleman's time.

The report (by Mr. MAHON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred House bill 1700, respectfully submit the following report:

At the breaking out of the war of the rebellion Warren Mitchell resided at Louisville, Ky. He was a merchant with extensive interests and connections, and had large amounts owing him in various sections of the South. General Anderson, commanding the Department of Kentucky, gave him a pass to enter the Confederate lines, and he went South "solely for the purpose of saving himself from financial ruin, leaving his wife at Louisville," and engaged in the proper and legitimate occupation of collecting, in the most available commodities, the amounts due him.

His base of operations was Memphis and Nashville, Tenn., and by December, 1864, he had gathered together 724 bales of cotton and had the same stored at Savannah, Ga., where it was seized by General Sherman, sold, and the proceeds, amounting to $128,692.22, turned into the Treasury.

Mr. Mitchell's character for loyalty, truthfulness, integrity, and honor is amply sustained by such men as Virgil McKnight, ex-Senator John W. Stevenson, Hon. Benjamin H. Bristow, and Maj. Gen. L. H. Rousseau, nor is it to be presumed that General Anderson would have issued a pass to a Confederate sympathizer.

Mr. Mitchell promptly brought his suit in the Court of Claims under the "abandoned and captured property act," and the court being equally divided upon his right to recover, his petition was dismissed. On appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States the sole issue was not his loyalty, nor the amount of his loss, but the question of his domicile. Attorney-General Williams thus stated the proposition:

"If Mitchell acquired a domicile within the Confederate lines, his business there was legitimate, and he is entitled to recover; if not, his business there was illegitimate, and he is not entitled to recover."

The Supreme Court stated the question thus:

"Hence this case turns upon the point whether the appellant was domiciled in the Confederate States when he bought the cotton in question." (21 Wall., 353.)

As a matter of fact, Mitchell resided for over three years in Tennessee in the laudable endeavor to protect his property, and he exercised many of the rights of citizenship, and it may well be questioned whether, if the case had been differently presented, the decision would not have been different.

In commenting on this feature of the case it is plain that the Supreme Court, in view of the petitioner's equities, must have felt a strong desire to be freed from the harsh rule of law under which they felt constrained to act, when they frankly tell us, at the end of their opinion, that "obviously important further facts bearing on the question might have been put in evidence by either party. We regret that this was not done. As the case is presented, our conclusion must necessarily be against the appellant."

The court held, however, that it appeared from the record Mitchell was a citizen of the State of Kentucky at the time of the seizure, and that therefore and for no other reason his business was illegitimate and he acquired no title to the property taken in payment of debts due him, because Kentucky was a loyal State, and the nonintercourse laws prohibited traffic between its citizens and citizens of States in rebellion.

In his brief before the Supreme Court John M. Harlan, now one of its justices, made the following unquestioned but startling proposition, when considered in the light of the court's decision:

"Had Mitchell, upon his entering the Confederate lines in July, 1861, joined the rebel army and become the owner of this identical cotton while he was endeavoring to overturn the Government of the Union, it could scarcely be doubted that under the present course of decisions his right to recover the proceeds of the cotton could not be questioned."

The decision of the court, therefore, was to the effect that if Mr. Mitchell had denied his allegiance to the United States and had become a citizen of Tennessee, instead of remaining loyal to the Union and to the State of his birth, he could have recovered in his suit, because he would not have been amenable to the nonintercourse laws, and his disloyalty would have been condoned by the President's amnesty proclamations. (U. S. v. Klein, 13 Wall., 128.)

The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held that the proceeds of the abandoned and captured property now in the Treasury are merely "trust funds" (U. S. v. Padelford, 9 Wall., 543), and millions of dollars have been distributed to the legal owners upon that theory, and since the decision in the Klein case, above, it has not been questioned that the amnesty proclamations restored all property rights, even to disloyal persons. If, as said by Mr. Harlan, this decedent claimant had been an active rebel in the field, he could still have recovered under the Klein decision. In this case the return of these "trust funds" by the trustee, who holds and claims nothing but the naked legal title, is not prevented by disloyalty or fraud, but by the mere accident of domicile.

Your committee does not doubt or criticise the decision of the Supreme Court, harsh and technical as it is, but the question now presented is, Shall this Government, by the mere exercise of an arbitrary power, longer keep from this claimant the proceeds of property which, in every sense except the technical one that the courts of law can not recognize his right to sue for it, is rightfully his; property to which the Government can make and does make no lawful claim; not confiscated or confiscable; not in its possession or control under any law except one that has been declared by its courts to make it a trustee of such property? The claimant appeals to the sovereign, whose citizen he is, for that justice which is his due.

Here no technical construction of law can be held to overthrow the real merits or equities of a case. To do absolute justice is the highest duty, as well as the undisputed power, of Congress. It is hard to conceive upon what moral principle this money can be longer kept in the Treasury of the United States, or the hand of the arbitrary power be placed so heavily on the children of this man, who passed his old age and died in poverty merely because of the accident of his residence in the loyal State of Kentucky instead of the disloyal one of Tennessee.

Your committee report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this claimant was not able to point out to the Court of Claims or to the Supreme Court, and the court indicated in its opinion that it did not appear that the domicile of this man was in the Confederate States during the time he was collecting this cotton. The court suggested that perhaps there was other evidence that either party might have used. While the report is full in its statement of the judgment, etc., and of the judgment of the Supreme Court which decided that this man or his survivors were not entitled to anything, it does not seem to be very full in stating what the evidence was, if there was any, that showed that this man had a domicile in the Confederate States. He said he was in the Confederate States for three years. Now, that fact, that evidence, and all that sort of thing is lacking, and the difficulty in this class of cases is this: They go to the courts; they employ eminent lawyers; the lawyers present their cases, and present the best kind of evidence they can find.

On the other side they are open to cross-examination on the part of the Government attorneys, and the court finally decides—even the Supreme Court of the United States—and they will then come in with ex parte evidence and bring bills before the House, which sends them to the Committee on War Claims, which proceeds to set aside the judgment of the Supreme Court on this ex parte evidence. I do not know, in claims of this size, why the committee should not submit the question of domicile to the Court of Claims. I understand there are bills upon this Calendar now reported from the Committee on War Claims where the claims themselves are now pending before the Court of Claims, and can be reached and the evidence taken on either side, and that court decide them, and bring them to the House on their report, or entering judgment, or finding the facts, and certifying them to be paid by appropriations. I think in large claims like this the chairman of the committee should not be content merely to submit the report, but should tell this committee what there is in it.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, the committee did not report this bill on any ex parte evidence. It was reported on the decision of the Court of Claims and of the Supreme Court, where Justice Harlan was the attorney for the claimant, Mitchell, and United States Attorney Williams appeared for the Government. In 1863 Warren Mitchell was a resident of Tennessee. The captured and abandoned property act had been passed. The reasons for the passage of the captured and abandoned property act were several. The first was, in the States that were in insurrection there were millions of dollars' worth of cotton, sugar, and other valuable property that could not be consumed by the Army, and it came to be a question of destruction or saving this property and keeping it for the wealth of the nation, for the present and for the future. The second was, it was a great temptation, with these large amounts of cotton in those States, for the blockade runners to run in and carry it to foreign ports, and bring the gold back to the treasury of the Confederate government. Our Government proposed in this law to take charge of the property and bring it into the Northern market, and dispose of it to people who needed cotton in foreign countries, and bring the gold into our Treasury. So the captured and abandoned property act was passed.

Now it is called captured and abandoned property. The act provided that any man in the South or in the States in insurrection could voluntarily bring his cotton to the great market places and warehouses where they were directed; that all property of this character captured by our forces was to be turned over to the places designated by the Treasury Department. The law provided that the cotton and property so captured and abandoned should be sold; the expenses of transportation and of selling should be deducted and a careful account should be kept of it, and that the sale should be reported to the Treasury of the United States, a careful inventory made as to who it belonged to and giving an account of the proceeds. So a sum of $37,000,000 under that act passed into the Treasury of the United States. The act also provided that people could apply to the Secretary of the Treasury, and if they could identify their property and the money placed in the Treasury, the Treasury could pay them. Some $14,000,000 were the net proceeds, and about $10,000,000 of that was paid out. This act expired in 1868. They had two years in which to apply for the proceeds of their property. The question of loyalty was raised against these claimants. The people in the States mentioned, women and minor children where the question of loyalty was not raised, got their money; but when the question of loyalty was raised against the claimants in the Court of Claims the Court of Claims held that if the claimant was disloyal he could not receive the proceeds.

The Padelford and Klein cases were carried to the Supreme Court of the United States to be settled on question of loyalty. Now, in brief, let us see what the Supreme Court of the United States said about it.

In the Klein case, the leading case on the subject, the court held:

That it was not the intention of Congress that the title to these proceeds should be divested absolutely out of the original owners of the property seems clear upon a comparison of different parts of the act.

We have already seen that those articles which became by the simple fact of capture the property of the captor, as ordnance, munitions of war, and the like, or in which third parties acquired rights which might be made absolute by decree, as ships and other vessels captured as prize, were expressly excepted from the operation of the act; and it is reasonable to infer that it was the purpose of Congress that the proceeds of the property for which the special provision of the act was made should go into the Treasury without change of ownership. Certainly such was the intention in respect to the property of loyal men. That the same intention prevailed in regard to the property of owners who, though then hostile, might subsequently become loyal, appears probable from the circumstance that no provision is anywhere made for confiscation of it, while there is no trace in the statute book of intention to divest ownership of private property not excepted from the effect of this act otherwise than by proceedings for confiscation.

In the case of Padelford we held that the right to the possession of private property was not changed until actual seizure by proper military authority, and that actual seizure by such authority did not divest the title under the provisions of the abandoned and captured property act. The reasons assigned seem fully to warrant the conclusion. The Government constituted itself the trustee for those who were by that act declared entitled to the proceeds of captured and abandoned property and for those whom it should thereafter recognize as entitled. By the act itself it was provided that any person claiming to have been the owner of such property might prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof, and on proof that he had never given aid or comfort to the rebellion receive the amount after deducting expenses.

This language makes the right to the remedy dependent upon proof of loyalty, but implies that there may be proof of ownership without proof of loyalty. The property of the original owner is in no case absolutely divested. There is, as we have already observed, no confiscation, but the proceeds of the property have passed into the possession of the Government, and restoration of the property is pledged to none except to those who have continually adhered to the Government.

Now, to be brief, this case came up after the President's proclamation. This case was settled. Then the question of loyalty came up, and in this case and in the two other leading cases the Supreme Court held that the proclamation issued by President Johnson in 1868—which he had the absolute right to issue under the Constitution of the United States—restoring to all these people in 1868 their political, personal, and property rights, gave them a right to this property in the Treasury, even though they had been in active rebellion against the Government. That is the decision of the highest court of our Government.

Now, under the proclamation prior to 1868, while the war was in progress, much of this money was paid out, and it required if any one of these people who owned cotton would come before a United States officer and take the oath of allegiance to the United States and renounce his allegiance to the Confederate government, that early proclamation stated that they were to be restored to their political, personal, and property rights; but this proclamation in 1868 required no oath of any kind. It absolutely wiped out the question of taking an obligation to the Government, and so the court held that every man who could identify his property, identify his portion of the money which was held as a trust fund, was entitled to have it; but while these decisions were in progress the act of 1868 expired and $4,000,000 were left in the Treasury, which perhaps no man will ever claim because no man can file a claim for it——

Mr. PAYNE. Is not that a violent assumption?

Mr. MAHON. Well, unless Congress authorizes them. There is no law on the statute books to-day by which any man can go to the Treasury of the United States or to the courts and put a claim in for this cotton unless by an act of Congress, because they are debarred by the statute which expired in 1868. Now, what is this case? This man Mitchell was a resident of Kentucky. His loyalty was unquestioned. The claim went to the Supreme Court. By the evidence of some of the best men of the State of Kentucky, men who have served in the United States Senate, they say that this man was absolutely loyal to the Government.

He was asked why he did not claim Tennessee as a residence. He had been in Tennessee for three years, and Justice Harlan, who was then his attorney, filed his claim and said if he had put in his petition—he had been long enough in Tennessee and lived among the people—fixing his domicile in Tennessee, although he had served in a Confederate regiment, he could have got the money out of the Treasury by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. That was based upon the fact of the nonintercourse act.

Mr. MAHON. I am coming to that. The nonintercourse act would not have interfered, but Mitchell said, "I am not a resident of Tennessee; I am a resident of Kentucky," and insisted that his petition should be filed in that way.

How did he get down to Tennessee? He went down there because the captured and abandoned property act had been passed. He was familiar with its provisions. At that time he did know the nonintercourse law had been passed. He goes to the general commanding that department, who issued him a permit to go down into the State of Tennessee, where he had had large transactions when the war broke out, and settle his claims. To save himself from bankruptcy he settled with his creditors and took the property—cotton, sugar, etc.—in payment of his claims. He was a wealthy man, and under that permission from the general commanding, waiving for a time the nonintercourse law, he went down into Tennessee to carry out the purpose of the abandoned-property act and get the cotton out of the country. He made settlement and took cotton to the amount of over $200,000, and after he had settled with the people who owed him he shipped the cotton to Savannah and had it placed in the warehouse, and in 1864, when General Sherman's army entered the city of Savannah, under the captured and abandoned property act General Sherman took the cotton, turned it into the warehouse, and it was sold by the United States official under that act, carefully inventoried, and the net proceeds of the sale of these 740 bales of cotton were turned into the United States Treasury, and the Treasury is indebted to him, so the Treasurer says, for about $128,000.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that that money is carried on the books of the Treasury Department to the credit of Warren Mitchell?

Mr. MAHON. Yes. When the Court of Claims had this up——

Mr. PAYNE. Why, it simply says in the books of the Treasury Department that the money was received as the proceeds of cotton that Warren Mitchell owned.

Mr. MAHON. Yes; that so much cotton was sold under this act.

Mr. PAYNE. The credit made by a clerk in the Treasury Department would not cut much of a figure.

Mr. MAHON. What is that?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Kentucky asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the money was not carried on the books of the Treasury Department as a credit to Warren Mitchell. Of course the mere fact that it appears on the books as the proceeds of cotton that belonged to Warren Mitchell does not cut much of a figure. The question is whether he was entitled to it.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Certainly. I only asked the question to bring out the fact as to the amount of the claim; that there is no dispute—that there was that much money turned into the Treasury Department as the proceeds of the cotton.

Mr. MAHON. Now, Mr. Chairman, these facts are clear about the case. First, that Warren Mitchell was the owner of the cotton in the warehouse at Savannah; second, it was taken under the captured and abandoned property act, and, thirdly, it was sold by the United States officials, a careful inventory made of every bale, the expenses of the sale deducted, and the net proceeds turned into the Treasury of the United States. Now, if he had been a citizen of the State of Tennessee, although he had been guilty of disloyalty to the Government, under this act as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States and President Johnson's proclamation he would have had his money long ago.

Now, what is the trouble? The Court of Claims was divided equally. I have got the report, and the judges were equally divided on one question. They agreed to everything else; they had found all the facts, and the only question before the court upon which this man was denied a judgment was that he had violated the nonintercourse act; that he had left the State of Kentucky and gone into the State of Tennessee and purchased this cotton. Now, the Court of Claims, as I say, was equally divided, one-half saying that he did not, and the other half saying that he did.

What is that act? That was an act prohibiting people in the loyal States going into the Confederate States and transacting business. How did this man get there? The mere fact of the man's loyalty was this: He applied to General Anderson as to whether he had the right to go down there under this act and gather the cotton together, and General Anderson issued to him a license or permit to go and do this very thing. Under that license he went there. Now, when we come into the Court of Claims, one-half of the court holds, under the conditions that he went into Tennessee, that he had not violated the nonintercourse act, and the other half holds that, technically, he did. All the members of the court expressed sympathy with this man that on account of this technical ground they were compelled to rule him out of court.

Now, where was he to come? They have found all the facts, and simply on the purely technical ground that he did not do it lawfully, but under a commission from the general commanding that department he went down there to do this very thing, but the Supreme Court said that that did not set aside the law, and they expressed regret that they could not so decide, and even said to the claimant, "If you had put in your petition that you had been a resident of Tennessee for three years, this court would have given you judgment against the Government for this sum of money."

Now, it is up to Congress. I want to say to the House that this is a large claim. I have been on the Committee on War Claims for nearly twelve years. The claims that come from that committee are generally small, running usually from two to three hundred dollars and very seldom exceeding five or six thousand dollars.

The committee went over the decisions of the courts and all of the evidence in the Court of Claims, and, after a careful and long deliberation, came to the conclusion that the Congress of the United States, the sovereign power, owed to this man who had been loyal, not money out of the Treasury of the United States which was put there by the taxpayers, but this one hundred and twenty-eight thousand and odd dollars which had been there since 1864 without interest. This man was not guilty of laches. That act expired in 1868, and as soon as his property had been captured and turned over to General Sherman and the property had been sold, and within a few weeks after the money had been turned into the Treasury of the United States, he filed his application with the Treasurer for the proceeds of his cotton and filed his claim in the Court of Claims, and from there it went to the Supreme Court, pressing it all the time until he became an old man and finally went down in bankruptcy and poverty.

He has an old wife and children, and I will say this: I have been on that committee for twelve years, and if this House is ever going to pass a claim doing absolute justice to a claimant against the United States Government this is one of them. No cleaner case ever came before you—no case having stronger equities and justice than are in this case. I don't know this old lady, I do not know her children, never have laid eyes on them; but I absolutely know that this claim is right and that they are now before the last tribunal, the Congress of the United States, asking by this bill that that money which has been lying in the Treasury since 1865 shall be paid over to these people, to whom it rightfully and equitably belongs.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the only doubt I had in this case at the commencement was the question of whether this man had been guilty of violation of the nonintercourse act.

Mr. MAHON. It was a technical violation.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course this act was passed for a useful purpose. It was passed to prevent citizens of the United States, loyal citizens of the United States, who loved their country more than anything else except, perhaps, personal gain, from going into the Confederate States and bringing out property and selling it and sometimes returning the gold to the Confederate States. It was passed for that purpose. Now, this man went in at the commencement of the war. He went in for the purpose of collecting his property, as was stated by the chairman of the committee. He remained in the Confederate States for the space of about three years and collected it so assiduously that he obtained $128,000 worth of cotton, which was stored at Savannah. I believe that some cotton which was stored at Savannah got to floating down the river and out of the Confederate States and into the markets of the world and that some money was smuggled in afterwards—gold for the payment of this cotton. The Supreme Court decided this case upon the point of a violation of the nonintercourse act.

Mr. MAHON. It was a technical violation.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, they did not say it was technical. The Supreme Court says:

> Hence this case stands upon the point whether the appellant was domiciled in the Confederate States when he bought the cotton in question.

I am not reading from the original report of the court, but from the report of the committee. I do not suppose they put all of the report in. I hope they are frank enough with the House to put in all that bears on this question. Then at the end of the opinion we find this, that—

> Obviously important further facts bearing on the question might have been put in evidence by either party. We regret that this is not done. As the case is presented our conclusion must necessarily be against the appellant.

That is all I see of any expression of regret on the part of the Supreme Court in regard to their coming to that conclusion; but the court thought that both the Government and the claimant could have put in other evidence, and they regretted that this was not done. This case is reported in 21 Wallace. Of course that is a very early report and this is a very early case in the Supreme Court. It appears from the report that John M. Harlan was the attorney for the claimant at the time. I supposed he had always been on the Supreme Bench. It is hard for me to think back to a time when he was not there. The case must have been decided very soon after the war. Now, I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] if the committee had decided the question of facts upon ex parte affidavits and he said, "No."

Mr. MAHON. We took it from the record.

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand it, the committee has no evidence in regard to that.

Mr. MAHON. We have the evidence that was before the Court of Claims.

Mr. PAYNE. But the Supreme Court had that. Did the committee have any other evidence than the Supreme Court had when they rendered their decision?

Mr. MAHON. Oh, no; we have had nothing outside of that.

Mr. PAYNE. Thirty-odd years have elapsed since that decision of the Supreme Court; all this time has elapsed; yet it does not appear that this claimant has ever been able to show, even by ex parte affidavits, that the ruling of the Supreme Court was not correct or that the finding of facts was not correct as to the fact of domicil and the fact of the violation of the nonintercourse act.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman realize that the Supreme Court was necessarily limited to a purely legal decision, and that frequently a case will arise——

Mr. PAYNE. They were limited to the question as presented by the attorneys for this claimant and the attorneys for the United States, upon the evidence as presented by them.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. PAYNE. Upon the evidence as then presented they said that this claim could not be allowed upon this very question of domicile or the question of the violation of the nonintercourse act. All this time has expired, and according to the statement of the chairman of the committee no evidence has been filed, not even by ex parte affidavits, to show that the finding of facts upon which the Supreme Court acted was not correct as stated in the record upon which the court based its opinion.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that the committee thought that even though this man was a citizen of Kentucky, he ought not to be cut off from his right to this money, which in equity is due him, he being a loyal citizen of a loyal State, when disloyal citizens of disloyal States were held to be entitled to their money, which was turned into the Treasury under the same circumstances.

Mr. PAYNE. He was cut off by the provision of the nonintercourse act, as held by the Supreme Court. Now, to bring him within some equity—some morality—by which the United States Government might be supposed to be bound to him, I think that this committee ought to have been able to state some facts showing that he had not engaged in collecting cotton and selling it outside.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. He had a permit.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. No attempt has been made to disprove that; he admits that he went in there.

Mr. PAYNE. It does not appear that he ever shipped a pound of cotton as a dealer in or shipper of cotton. I asked the chairman of the committee what evidence he had, and he said he had ex parte evidence.

Mr. MAHON. Evidence presented to the Court of Claims.

Mr. PAYNE. Evidence presented to the Court of Claims and also to the Supreme Court.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The Supreme Court cut out his claim upon technical rules of evidence.

Mr. PAYNE. The court could not do otherwise than try the case upon the facts presented by the evidence.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. There was no special controversy over the facts. The court held that he had violated the nonintercourse law and therefore could not recover. The same facts were before the committee, and they concluded that, considering the strong equity of the case, he was entitled to this money, notwithstanding the fact that he had violated the nonintercourse law.

Mr. PAYNE. So that this is a question merely of moral obligation.

Mr. MAHON. The court held that the title was in Warren Mitchell, and therefore it could not be in the Government.

Mr. PAYNE. But the court did not hold that he was entitled to pay.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. The court held that he acted as a trustee.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course it is only a step beyond this case to an entire disregard of the nonintercourse act and a loose way of determining claims here, without any legal evidence whatever as to the facts.

Mr. MAHON. The court held that this man's right to this private property was unchallenged; that his title had not been divested, but refused to render judgment in his favor because of the violation of the nonintercourse act.

Mr. PAYNE. My friend has suggested that there was $4,000,000 in the United States Treasury, claims for which will probably never be made. He should not lay any such flattering unction to his soul. Why, Mr. Chairman, a question similar to this came up in the last Congress in reference to the claims of certain persons for carrying the mails in the Confederate States after the war broke out. Those claimants were asking payment of those claims from our Government.

Of course, the most of these claims were paid. The Confederate government supposed all of them were paid by the Confederacy. The Government of the United States came into possession of a book showing the settlements of the Confederate government, a book that had been mutilated in some way by cutting out of it a number of pages. I saw the book myself, and it shows payments to a great many claimants who came in here and swore, without any "mental reservation or purpose of evasion," as far as could be ascertained, that they had never been settled with. Yet this book showed a complete settlement of those claims. Well, Congress was getting along very well with those claims. They would go to this book, in the office of the Postmaster-General, and it would appear on a certain page that the claim had been settled in full at a certain date.

Mr. MAHON. That is an entirely different matter from these cases.

Mr. PAYNE. They were getting along very well, but it turned out finally that there was one claim that they did not find on that book, and immediately an effort was made to get at the book. The Postmaster-General——

Mr. MAHON rose.

Mr. PAYNE. Wait a minute until I tell this little story. The Postmaster-General kept the book locked up and did not allow people to see it, but some one, at the suggestion of somebody, I suppose it was the original suggestion of somebody outside, in another place where they suppose they are engaged in legislative duties, offered an innocent resolution one day, asking the Postmaster-General to furnish a list of those people who had been settled with, and the full particulars contained in this book. That information was immediately sent to another place and published as a document. At once all of these people whose names did not appear on that mutilated book as having been settled with, began to come to Congress with their claims. They made the same kind of affidavits that they had made before. I suppose most of them have been paid.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. If the gentleman will permit me, I think he ought to state that these reports did not come from the Committee on War Claims of this House.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I said another place. I did not say they came from a committee of this House. And so, if these accounts are there in the Treasury Department, that So and so's cotton has been sold, I suppose some way will be found by which these names will be ascertained; and these agents at the city of Washington, who are most industrious, thrifty, frugal people, will be sending around these enticing letters saying that "There is such and such a claim in favor of the estate of So and so, who was your grandfather (or whoever he may have been), and if you will put it in my hands I will carry it through for you for the slight compensation of 50 per cent on the recovery." So this $4,000,000 will go aglimmering. If we let down the bars and set aside this non-intercourse act by this bill, it will only hasten the day when these individuals will appear here and the money will be paid out. That is all I have to say.

Mr. MAHON. Now, I want to say to the gentleman from New York that the books he speaks of were kept by the Confederates, and were turned into the archives of our Government. The difference is that these books we are now referring to have been kept by the Treasury of the United States. They are not mutilated. The accounts are in Treasury books, and the Court of Claims have found that this money is in the Treasury and that it is the proceeds of the property belonging to the claimant in this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, right there——

Mr. MAHON. Hold on. As I said, I have no interest in this case except to do this man the justice that should be done him, even at this late day. It is not his fault.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the gentleman has no personal interest in the case.

Mr. MAHON. We appeal to sovereign power, and beyond all controversy that money belongs to Warren Mitchell, except that the Supreme Court on a technical point refused judgment, at same time expressing their sympathy with him. Now, in place of talking about post-office claims and some other old rotten claims, why not look at the facts in this case? That is no reason why this claim should not be paid. I believe in paying every claim upon its merits and the equities of the case. This is a body that finally does the last justice to an outraged citizen. This is a body where no technical objection will be heeded, and if any citizen of this great Government comes here and says that the Government has taken his property, that he was loyal to the Government, and that under an act of Congress the Government sold it and put the proceeds in the Treasury, not as the money of the Government, but as his money, and that money can be traced there for an absolute certainty, I say this is a body where no technical objections will avail. We are not complaining about the Supreme Court. This man is a citizen of this country, and this is the sovereign power. He comes here and asks us to do him this justice.

Now, I hold that the act which has been referred to expired in 1868, and every man who did not file his claim to the proceeds in the Treasury was debarred by the act of 1863; but this is one of the few men who is not covered by that. I want to say, gentlemen, that the War Claims Committee are getting about three or four thousand bills referred to them every session. They report back only two or three hundred. There have been thousands of bills sent down here, but upon inquiry at the Treasury Department they could not ascertain whether the claimants owned the cotton, and the Committee on War Claims, whenever they ascertained that a claimant has never filed his claim under the act of 1863 and asserted his right under the law, in the last twelve years have never reported a bill favorably. But this is one of the few men who did go into the Treasury Department and file his claim, and carried it through the courts, as I have stated, with the results heretofore stated.

It is not a question of whether there is four millions. I do not know of a dollar that goes out, but if it ever does go out, it goes out by an act of Congress, so that bugaboo does not affect this bill at all, and the gentleman from New York tries to frighten the House by saying that he thinks a great many who get this money are not entitled to it. Why, I know of cases where President Lincoln himself gave a license, which was signed by the Secretary of War, allowing men to go down into the old State of Virginia and bring thousands and thousands of pounds of tobacco out of that State, and when that property was sold the man who brought it out got one half and the Government got the other half of the value of the property. Now, I ask this House in justice to pass this bill. If you do, I am content; if you do not, I am content. I have discharged my duty. I say that this bill ought to pass.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand that there are some bills that the committee do not report that come before it.

Mr. MAHON. A great many.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the committee ever report many of them adversely and file the reports, so that they are printed for the consideration of future Congresses?

Mr. MAHON. I expect about 500 in this Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. MAHON. I want to say this——

Mr. PAYNE. I had been of the opinion that the committee did not file any adverse reports.

Mr. MAHON. The only bills that are on this Calendar reported from that committee are those which have been reported after the most careful consideration.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, some of them have needed careful consideration.

Mr. MAHON. I admit that.

Mr. PAYNE. Not only turning aside the judgment of the court——

Mr. MAHON. Thousands of bills have come into that committee that will never be reported.

Mr. PAYNE. If this was to go on—granting the right to set aside the judgments of courts—there is going to be a million of them instead of 4,000.

Mr. MAHON. But we will only throttle them.

Mr. PAYNE. The number will only depend upon the avarice of the claimants.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

LIGHT-DRAFT MONITOR ETLAH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 201) for the relief of the contractor or his legal representatives for the construction of the light-draft monitor Etlah.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the contractor or his legal representatives for the construction of the light-draft monitor Etlah may be submitted by said contractor or his legal representatives within six months after the passage of this act to the Court of Claims, under and in compliance with the rules and regulations of said court, and said court shall have jurisdiction, legal and equitable, to hear and determine and render judgment upon the same: Provided, however, That the investigation of said claim shall be made upon the following bases: The said court shall ascertain the additional cost which was necessarily incurred by said contractor for building said light-draft monitor Etlah in the completion of the same by reason of any changes or alterations in the plans and specifications required and delays in the prosecution of the work: Provided further, That such additional cost in completing the same and such changes and alterations in the plans and specifications required and delays in the prosecution of the work were occasioned by the Government of the United States; but no allowance for the advance in the price of any labor or material shall be considered, unless such advance could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary prudence and vigilance on the part of the contractor: And provided further, That the compensation fixed by the contractor and the Government for specific alterations in advance of such alterations shall be conclusive as to the compensation to be made therefor: Provided, That such alterations when made complied with the specifications for the same as furnished by the Government: And provided further, That all moneys paid to said contractor by the Government over and above the original contract price for building said vessel shall be deducted from any amounts allowed by said court by reason of the matters hereinbefore stated: And provided further, That if any such changes cause less work and expense to the contractor than the original plans and specifications a corresponding deduction shall be made from any allowance which may be made by said court to said claimant: And provided further, That said claim may be submitted as aforesaid, notwithstanding any statute of limitations or proceedings heretofore instituted for the collection of said claim, and in any proceedings heretofore instituted before said court, prior to the grant by said Congress of general equitable jurisdiction to said court, any testimony that may have been taken under the rules of said court, and any findings of fact which may be based thereon, shall be duly considered by the court and given such weight and effect as the court shall deem equitable and just.

Mr. MAHON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I was assigned to make this report. Therefore I will endeavor to explain the case as near as I can. In the latter part of 1862 and the beginning of 1863 the Government contracted to build twenty light-draft, ironclad monitors. They were practically all after the same pattern, were to be constructed in eight months, were to cost $385,000, and if completed in six months were to cost $395,000. The Government, knowing that the construction of monitors were new in the line of war ships, reserved the right in these contracts to change the plans from time to time. The engagement had at Charleston showed that the plans as originally drafted had to be very materially changed. So the plans were changed, and there were so many delays that, instead of these boats being completed in six months, this boat was not completed and accepted until November, 1865. Charles W. McCord, of St. Louis, built this boat, and built it at St. Louis.

There were so many delays, and the price of labor and material increased rapidly, and the cost of the monitor, as given by the testimony of the United States engineer and the United States inspector, was nearly double the original contract price. The result was that Mr. McCord failed, went into bankruptcy, and his assets were sold by the court of bankruptcy. Among the assets assigned were the claims for extra and for the enhanced price of labor and material in constructing this boat. The assignee of McCord went into the Court of Claims under the law jurisdiction of that court, and during the progress of the trial McCord died. During the progress of the trial there was presented by the Government a receipt which was to the effect that a receipt had been given for $26,000, and that it was in full of all claims. It was signed by Gillman, Son & Co., bankers, of New York, as the agents of McCord. The assignees being unaware of this receipt, were, however, forced to submit the case to the judgment of the court without an explanation of the receipt. The Court of Claims found the facts as follows:

From these circumstances the work required and done under the original contract was enhanced in cost to the contractor $122,166 beyond the contract price, less deductions for labor and materials saved by changes and alterations, $3,882.80, leaving a balance for increased cost of work required by the contract of $118,383.20.

And, from the same circumstances, the cost to the contractor of the extra materials and labor on the vessels required by the changes and alterations made, exclusive of special contracts paid, was $172,273.55, of which $116,111 was paid, leaving a balance for extra material and labor of $56,162.55.

The court found practically the equities in the case, but rejected the item of $56,000 on account of the unexplained receipt. The other item for enhanced price of labor and material was rejected because the assignment from the court of bankruptcy had not been properly drawn. Later, in the Forty-eighth Congress, the Committee on War Claims sent this claim to the Court of Claims under the terms of the Bowman Act. In the trial of this case under this reference it appeared that Gillman, Son & Co. signed this receipt without knowledge that it stated that it was in full for all claims. They stated that they had no authority to sign such a receipt, that they knew nothing about the state of the contract between McCord and the Government. It also appeared the assignment had been properly corrected by order of the court which made the original assignment. The Court of Claims did not take jurisdiction of the claim under the reference, but intimated that all the facts had been substantially found heretofore to show the merits of the case.

A subsequent Congress, the Fifty-first Congress, referred this claim to the Court of Claims under a bill similar in terms to other bills referring claims of this character to that court, which bill was vetoed by President Harrison. The veto was not based on any grounds against the merits of the bill, simply because he stated that he thought the Court of Claims had already found the findings in the matter and had given the information upon which Congress could afford the relief, if it saw fit to do so. Acting upon this veto, recommendations were made in this House and also in the Senate for a direct appropriation of amount of claims, and the Senate passed a bill, but it was not reached in the House. Later, in the Fifty-fourth Congress, the bill was included in the general deficiency bill. It passed both Houses, and went to President Cleveland. President Cleveland vetoed the bill on several grounds, and among other reasons he vetoed it on account of this bill, stating that there had been already paid to these people $210,000 for extras.

The President in this veto was mistaken in this regard, because the Court of Claims found that claimants had been paid but $116,000 on those extras, the President being in error by $94,000. His further objection was that this claimant had receipted in full for this claim, but the Court of Claims found that there was still due $56,000 on the very item which the President claimed had been receipted for, and Congress in four other instances made direct appropriations to relieve claimants where they had signed similar receipts. They had also in about half a dozen other cases referred claims to the Court of Claims, giving equitable jurisdiction where the Court of Claims held that these receipts were not a bar to the claim. The action of the committees of both Houses since the Forty-sixth Congress have been uniformly favorable with one exception, and that is the report in the Fifty-fifth Congress. The House has reported this bill favorably nine different times, and at two different times passed the same. The Senate has reported this bill favorably seven different times, and at five different times in one way or another has passed the same.

This claim is entirely similar to one that Congress has heretofore sent to the Court of Claims, known as "An act for the relief of Nathaniel McKay and the executors of Donald McKay for the building of the ironclad Squando." McKay & Aldus were the builders of this boat. They later went into bankruptcy and the assets of the firm were sold. McKay purchased those assets. By act of Congress he was permitted to go to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims awarded something over $115,000. This case is almost identical with the Etlah, because the contracts were the same, the price was to be the same, and the time for completion was to be the same, and these people went into bankruptcy. They had an assignment and had also signed a receipt similar to the one that was signed in this case, only in the case of the Etlah it was signed by bankers in their regular course of business, but in this case the receipt was signed by McKay & Aldus, and the court held that this receipt was no bar to recovery and awarded them the sum of $115,000.

It will also be remembered that Congress made a direct appropriation relieving the contractors who built the monitor Shiloh, appropriating $125,000 for items similar to what is claimed here and substantially under similar circumstances. The boat Shiloh was built in the same yard with the Etlah, and the general office was used by both of these builders. So that the equities in the case of the two are substantially the same.

By an act approved May 27, 1902, Congress sent to the Court of Claims nearly every one of these remaining twenty claims. I believe they are all disposed of now except this one and perhaps one more. The terms under which they were sent to the Court of Claims were identical with this bill, with the exception of the last proviso, which has reference to matters that took place in the court heretofore in this case.

Now, I believe that this claim possesses all the merits, waiving the question of what amount should be found, that were possessed by any one of these other claims that Congress has already granted relief in. They have paid in four instances by direct appropriations, and half a dozen other cases have been sent to the Court of Claims, and the court allowed the claims and they have been paid by Congress. By an act approved in May, 1902, nine other claims of this character were sent to the Court of Claims, and it is no more than justice to give these people the same treatment that the other claimants have had.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. OTJEN. Very well.

Mr. FINLEY. The real claimants are the people who purchased these claims at a bankrupt sale?

Mr. OTJEN. The claimants are the heirs of Choutean, Harrison & Vale. They were the ones who furnished the iron and were the largest creditors.

Mr. FINLEY. Were they the purchasers at the bankrupt sale?

Mr. OTJEN. I understand so.

Mr. FINLEY. What consideration did they pay?

Mr. OTJEN. I do not know; they were the largest creditors, having furnished the iron, and they owed them something like $200,000.

Mr. FINLEY. The committee has no information as to the amount of the consideration?

Mr. OTJEN. No; I presume the consideration is in some of these Court of Claims reports, but I do not remember now what it is.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask if the committee had any method of ascertaining what the consideration was?

Mr. OTJEN. I think so; but that would not be a very material point as to the merits of the claim, as I take it.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman mentions other vessels built in the same yard and settled for. Did the builders go into bankruptcy and the claims pass into other hands?

Mr. OTJEN. In the case of McKay & Aldus, they went into bankruptcy, and McKay bought the claim against the Government and, I think, paid $1,500 for the claim.

Mr. FINLEY. I notice in the report of the committee that the bankers Gilman & Son signed a receipt. What was the nature of the authority of these bankers?

Mr. OTJEN. They testified before the Court of Claims that they signed the receipt in the ordinary course of business, but that they did not examine the receipt, and that they had no authority from McCord further than to take the money they received.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand that. That is in the report of the committee; but I ask this question: What was the nature of the authority of these bankers as to signing the receipt?

Mr. OTJEN. They were simply agents to collect the twenty-six thousand and some odd dollars as bankers. I now yield back the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAHON. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee want?

Mr. SIMS. Three minutes.

Mr. MAHON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, this claim is on all fours with quite a number of others reported to the House and passed, as stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin who has just taken his seat. I opposed every one of the bills from the fact that in every instance they had settled with the Navy Department and accepted what was given them in full of all claims for damages. I made the best fight I could in every case and got defeated most ingloriously in every case. This claim is just as good as any of the others that have been paid, and having made such an inglorious failure to impress the House with the injustice of the claims, I thought I would leave the job to some one who would have much better success than I had. I shall vote against it and oppose it on the same ground I did the other cases. But if we are going to vote consistently, I think you gentlemen who voted for the other bills will have to vote for this. I shall vote against it, as I did against the others.

Mr. OTJEN. Congress having relieved practically all the others of these monitor claimants is it not right to treat this claim in the same way as the others were treated?

Mr. SIMS. To be consistent, those who voted for the other bills should vote for this one.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman from Tennessee stated that this bill is as good as some others that have been passed. Will he say that it is as good as many others that have not been paid?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, I think hundreds have not been paid that are far better than this. As I say, I only want to put myself right in this matter. I see no additional grounds for voting against it except that this has been vetoed more often than any of the others.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, of course the gentleman can make that motion, but we will debate it for a while.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania yielded the floor?

Mr. MAHON. Oh, no. I will give the gentleman all the time he wants.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not ask the gentleman for any time. When he gets through, I will take my own time.

Mr. MAHON. I simply want to get action on the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I find that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], the chairman of the committee, reported adversely this bill in the Fifty-fifth Congress at the second session.

Mr. MAHON. I did.

Mr. PAYNE. So I suppose we will have him voting with us against this claim now. I am glad to see that we are getting some reenforcements. It only illustrates what I have been contending for for some years, that when a bad bill appears before the committee and the committee is satisfied that they ought to report it, they do so and put themselves on record. Now, this boat was to cost $386,000. It has been so manipulated that if this bill passes it will cost about double that sum. We are engaged in trying to build up a new Navy. We expend from $60,000,000 to $80,000,000, more or less, a year, paying it out on contract to build up a new Navy. If these precedents are to be followed out, in the coming generation what we expect is going to cost us $60,000,000 a year is going to cost us $120,000,000 a year.

Mr. OTJEN. In the new Navy that we are building up does the Government reserve the right to change the contract at will?

Mr. PAYNE; Oh, yes; they constantly change the contracts. The Board of Construction changes them. They put in things up to date, and things that get out of date, and all that sort of thing. We are liable to the same thing in the future, and the vice of the whole business, Mr. Chairman, is that never, never can we get a settlement. Here is the bill for a monitor built, I think, in 1862. The Government settled with the original contractor, paid him about $200,000, I think, according to this report. I will quote from the report of the chairman of the committee [Mr. MAHON] in 1897:

> The contractor was paid * * * the sum of $210,991 for extras over and above the contract price, and of this sum the last payment, of $31,101, was made on the 11th day of May, 1866, and then Charles W. McCord receipted for the extras expressly in full.

It appears that some attorney signed this receipt for Charles W. McCord, and afterwards one of them testified that he was not authorized to say it was in full for all extras and bind his principal in that way, but he was authorized to receive the money.

I don't care whether he was authorized or not. Charles W. McCord was the original contractor. He knew how much had been expended in extras. He knew how much he had been delayed, and he knew at the time. He knew before he was in bankruptcy; he knew while he was still doing business; he made up his bill for his extras, and he was settled with and received his $210,000, according to the report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. There is a good deal of haziness, if you look through all these reports, as to the amount he actually did receive. When President Harrison vetoed this bill he put it on the ground that all the facts in the case were known to Congress and there was no use in sending it to the Court of Claims. It got in as a deficiency in an appropriation bill, and on account of this item and two or three others President Cleveland vetoed the deficiency bill and put it on the ground that the man had been paid nearly double the contract price and had settled in full.

After he had settled in full, and after this receipt had been given, he went into bankruptcy, and the assignee in bankruptcy sold his assets. This valuable asset was put up and sold, and these gentlemen who are now the claimants, who now come before Congress with this large bill for extra services, were the purchasers from the assignee in bankruptcy. I have looked through these reports, as far as I have been able. The report of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OTJEN] contains some twenty pages, and the report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] some six or eight pages.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. At what price was it sold?

Mr. PAYNE. That is what I was going to say. I have not been able to find out what price it was sold for, whether they gave a dollar for it, or some other good and valuable consideration. That does not appear anywhere in these reports. They come in here now and ask the Congress of the United States to open up this case. A gentleman who sits near me says that they did not give one dollar for it. They were creditors of this gentleman, and I suppose they had to give some nominal sum. They bid it in as creditors, to be allowed on their claim, I suppose, but they did not pay any actual money for it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Well, there might have been a consideration even then.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose there was some consideration named. I have not been able to find what it is, as yet. This committee has not given us that information, or, if they have, I would like them to point it out.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to my friend that he is in error in the statement he made with respect to the reasons President Cleveland gave for vetoing this. One of the grounds was that if the item was allowed the cost of the boat would be about double what the contract price called for, and I think the gentleman stated that the objection was that it had cost that much.

Mr. PAYNE. Perhaps I did make a mistake on that point. But let me read the language of President Cleveland's veto:

> The contract for the construction of this battery was made by the Government with Charles W. McCord during the war, and he was to be paid therefor the sum of $386,000. He was paid this sum and $210,991 for extras, and in May, 1866, gave his receipt in full. The assignee of McCord in bankruptcy assigned to Chouteau and his associates in 1868 all claims of McCord against the United States for the precise extras for which he had receipted in full two years before. Chouteau brought suit in the Court of Claims for such extras and was defeated. I can not gather from the facts I have been able to collect concerning this appropriation that it is justified on any ground.
> In 1891 my immediate predecessor vetoed a bill allowing the matter to be examined again by the Court of Claims.
> If the additional payment proposed in this bill was made, the cost of the battery in question would be almost double that of the contract price.

Now, I am not going to debate this bill in extenso. I am not fully enough posted to do so, and I do not know that any other Member is.

Mr. OTJEN. Will the gentleman read what Senator BURROWS said, following the reading of the veto?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, yes. I see that Senator BURROWS says on the next page that these people were paid, not $200,000 but $110,000. On the other hand, my friend from Pennsylvania, who is usually very accurate in figures, says that they have been paid $210,000. Where these learned doctors disagree, far be it from me to undertake to settle such a question of fact. But I do not care whether the amount paid was $110,000 or $200,000.

Mr. OTJEN. The Court of Claims found the facts.

Mr. PAYNE. I see it stated in another of these reports that $210,000 was the amount paid. I can only get my information from the statements presented to us by the committee. Of course, I have not time to go and examine the files; it would be impossible. I must take the facts as presented here.

But I repeat, I do not care whether the amount paid was $110,000 or $210,000. This man was settled with. He brought in his bill for extras; he submitted the details to the Department; he agreed with the Department as to the amount, and the Department paid him in full, and that ought to be, it seems to me, an end to this claim.

But, sir, my friend from Nebraska [Mr. MCCARTHY], who sits behind me, has had more time to examine this matter than I have, and I yield to him.

Mr. MCCARTHY. Mr. Chairman, I have made only a casual examination of this case, and if the gentlemen who are in favor of this bill can convince me that it is right no man in this Hall will more cheerfully vote for the measure than I will. But after my examination of the case I am satisfied that the claim is wrong. I am satisfied that the amount was paid before the claim was assigned. I am thus satisfied from an examination of the evidence and from the further fact that two Presidents of the United States have vetoed bills for the payment of this claim, and from the further fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has squarely declared that the claim was paid, and paid in full.

The only reasons assigned by the committee for making a favorable report on this bill are these: First. That other bills fully as iniquitous as this have been paid. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has candidly admitted that heretofore he has always opposed such measures as this. I assume that he was candid in his opposition, and that he still believes the opposition which he interposed to former bills of this same character was right. Now, if it was wrong to allow those other bills, it is wrong to allow this, just because this is similar to those and no worse.

Mr. SIMS. I opposed this bill in the committee and did all I could to prevent its being reported, and I am going to oppose its adoption by this Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAHON. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to disclose committee secrets.

Mr. SIMS. I did not file any minority report, and it is only in this way that I can vindicate my position.

Mr. McCARTHY. Another reason assigned by the committee in its report for the recommendation of this bill is the fact that former Congresses have acted upon it favorably. Now, neither of these two reasons is sufficient to my mind, as opposed to the evidence as I see it, to justify me in voting for this measure.

I assume that this report is as favorable as any report that could be drawn on this bill; and I desire to read a few excerpts from this report. First, on page 4, we find that—

Mr. Thomas P. Gillman testified that he was the member of the firm who signed the receipts, and that he was not aware that the paper contained the words "the full and final payment on all extras."

Now, that seems a remarkable proposition for an intelligent banker like Mr. Gillman, of New York, to testify to. I can see how an ignorant man, incapable of reading or writing the English language, might testify to a fact of that kind; but it is beyond my comprehension how Mr. Gillman could do it.

Well, he testified to some other things, to the understanding of his firm. Now, I do not believe that Mr. Gillman is a competent witness to testify as to the understanding of his firm. There might have been other members of that same firm who had an entirely different understanding of it.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. MAHON. Without reference to this bill, I wish to say to the gentleman that it has been the custom of the Treasury Department, not only in this case, but in a great many others, where men were under heavy obligations, borrowing money to build ships, and one thing and another, for the Department to make an adjudication to suit themselves, although it did not suit the contractor. He says, "That is not my contract." The Department say to him, "You take this and sign a receipt in full or you get nothing." There are hundreds of contractors who signed receipts in full who were paid afterwards in spite of the receipts.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman discover any evidences of duress in this report?

Mr. MAHON. I am not talking about this report.

Mr. PAYNE. I am talking about this case.

Mr. MAHON. I say it has been the practice of the Treasury Department in many cases to say to these people, "Sign a receipt in full or go into bankruptcy."

Mr. McCARTHY. That may be the practice, but I submit that there is not an iota of evidence in this case to show that duress of any kind was employed.

Now, Mr. Gillman went on testifying as to the understanding of his firm. In any court he would be required to testify not to conclusions and understandings, but to actual facts. We will get to them later on, and we shall see if the real facts in the case warranted any such conclusion or understanding on the part of Mr. Gillman or his firm. The report says:

Mr. Thomas P. Gillman testified that he was the member of the firm who signed the receipt, and that he was not aware that the paper contained the words "being the full and final payment on all extras;" that the understanding of his firm was that they were simply authorized to receipt for money due McCord from the Government.

Now, it does not matter what his understanding was. His authority was derived from a written power of attorney, and that written power of attorney is incorporated in the opinion of the Supreme Court, and it is better evidence of what the real facts in the case were, and as to the extent of Mr. Gillman's authority, than any reminiscences in his mind twenty or thirty years later. He testifies—

That they had no power to bind their principal in the matter of extras; that they had simply assumed to act as his bankers to receive the money and place it to his credit; that he signed this receipt exactly as he had signed other receipts, simply for the purpose of collecting the money; that it was not their custom to examine this kind of paper, and he did not think he looked over the language of the voucher; that his firm knew nothing of the state of the account between McCord and the United States.

That is remarkable, but Mr. McCord had reposed confidence in these gentlemen. They were appearing as his attorneys in fact, authorized to do any act pertaining to that matter that he could do if personally present. Two powers of attorney were executed. The first seemed to be inadequate, did not seem to confer large enough powers upon the attorneys, and the next was executed evidently after some question had arisen between McCord and this Government and was drawn sufficiently broad to confer all powers upon the attorneys to settle contested questions, and drawn for that purpose.

Mr. OTJEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. OTJEN. Where do you get that information?

Mr. McCARTHY. I get it from the copy of the power of attorney filed as a part of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States. I will read it directly.

Again this report, copying from the report of a former Congress, says:

To know that this whole statement is erroneous and misleading it is only necessary to know the facts.

That is, the misstatement by President Cleveland in his veto message.

Now, what are the facts—some of them which they cite?

It has been shown that the receipt was signed by McCord's financial agent without knowing what he was doing—

That is, Mr. Gillman, if you please, signed this receipt without even knowing what he was doing—and without the knowledge of his principal or his authority to bind him in that regard.

We will see about that. Now, I should like to know what there is in this case to justify the committee or justify anyone in arriving at the conclusion that Mr. Gillman did not have ample authority to sign that receipt. Mr. Gillman is presumed to have been able to read and write the English language and to have known the full contents of the voucher accompanying the receipt.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Who questions Mr. Gillman's authority to sign it?

Mr. McCARTHY. The committee report, right here. I have just read it. You can find it at the top of page 6. This report says he had no authority to sign it. He had power and authority to sign it in full:

It is alleged by the petitioners that this receipt was unknown to them before the day of the trial, and they had no opportunity to rebut or explain, and Messrs. Gillman, in their evidence, state that if such a receipt was signed by them it was done without knowing the purport thereof.

They are coming to the point now where they begin seriously to doubt whether they have really signed the receipt or not. But if they did sign it they are more satisfied than ever that they did not read it over; that if such a receipt was signed it was done without their knowledge, without knowing its purport, and that they were only authorized as bankers to receive whatever moneys might be paid on account of such vessel, the payment to be made in New York; that they had no knowledge whatever of the account between the Government and their principal.

You will agree with me, after having heard read the second power of attorney executed in this case, that they had full authority and that it was their duty to know. Any man in McCord's situation, who places his case in the hands of his attorney, is bound by what his attorney does as fully as if he had performed the act himself.

Again, the courts proceeded seemingly upon the theory that McCord had participated in or assented to the preparation of the voucher, and his rights were therefore necessarily concluded by the receipt executed by his attorneys in fact.

Again:

In fact, from the circumstances of the case and the situation of the parties, your committee is of the opinion that it is altogether probable that such was the fact. The voucher was doubtless prepared by the Navy Department in the ordinary course, and receipted by Gillman, Sons & Co. as and for so much money, and without any thought upon their part of adjusting the claims of McCord for extra work or materials.

Now I read from the United States Reports, volume 95, beginning on page 62. I will first read this voucher which Gillman, Sons & Co. signed:

[Etlah—Payment on account of extras.]

NEW YORK, April 25, 1866.

United States Navy Department to Charles W. McCord, Dr. (Appropriation: Construction and repair): For work done to the light-draft monitor Etlah, which is extra to the contract dated June 24, 1863, being the full and final payment on all extras, and in full for all claims and demands for that work, $31,114.

It mentions extras as compared with the original contract price, because the contract price had been paid long before, and much in excess of that contract price had been paid long before, and this voucher was executed solely for the purpose of settling the claim which remained for extra work and labor.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman know how much was paid in the way of extras?

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, President Cleveland said that after his investigation $210,000 had been paid for extras, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], in his report to the Fifty-seventh Congress, said the same thing.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Two hundred and ten thousand nine hundred and ninety-one dollars.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes. I desire to read the first power of attorney and then ask why the second power of attorney was executed:

Know all men by these presents that I, Charles W. McCord, of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, have made, constituted, and appointed, and by these presents do make, constitute, and appoint, Gillman, Son & Co., or either member of said firm, in the city of New York, my true and lawful attorney, for me and in my name, place, and stead, to collect from the navy agent or authorized officer of the United States Government all payments due or to become due to me for building an ironclad vessel at St. Louis, Mo., named the Etlah, as per contract dated 24th June, 1863, giving and granting unto my said attorney full power and authority to do and perform all and every act and thing whatsoever requisite and necessary to be done in and about the premises, as fully, to all intents and purposes, as I might or could do if personally present, with full power of substitution and revocation, hereby ratifying and confirming all that my said attorney or his substitute shall lawfully do or cause to be done by virtue hereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal the 24th day of November, in the year 1863.

CHARLES W. McCORD. [SEAL.]

Sealed and delivered in the presence of—
THOMAS L. THORNWELL.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That was three years before this receipt was given?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, sir; but before the time that the light-draft monitor Etlah had been completed under the original contract after many changes had been suggested and arranged for.

Now, for some reason it was thought that this power of attorney was inadequate; that questions in regard to this transaction were liable to arise or had arisen which this power of attorney did not provide for, so on the 2d day of January, 1894, the following power of attorney was executed:

Know all men by these presents that Charles W. McCord, of the city of St. Louis and State of Missouri, has made, constituted, and appointed, and by these presents do make, constitute, and appoint, Messrs. Gillman, Son & Co., of the city of New York, my true and lawful attorney, for me and in my name, and for my use, to ask—

What! Do as they were authorized to do under the other one? No.

To ask, demand, sue for—

It looks as if they were going to have a lawsuit now, so there is authorization—to sue for, recover, and receive all such sum or sums of money, debts, goods, wares, and other demands whatsoever, which are or shall be due, owing or payable and belonging to me.

And will you permit Messrs. Gillman, Son & Co., in the face of a written authority of that character, to come before you and say that they did not have authority to receipt for Mr. McCord? Would not we be considered a wise set of legislators to stand for any such violent construction of this instrument as they now seem to place upon it in view of what the Supreme Court says presently? However, I will proceed with the reading of this power of attorney:

Especially to receive any payments that are and will be due me by virtue of a contract entered into with the Navy Department to build a light-draft monitor, named Etlah, said contract bearing date June 24, 1863, for which I am to receive, upon the full compliance of said contract, the sum of $386,000, in eight equal payments, the Navy Department reserving 25 per cent on such payments until completion and reception of said vessel; giving and granting unto my said attorneys by these presents full power and authority in and about the premises to have, use, and take all lawful ways and means, in my name, for the purposes aforesaid; and upon the receipt of any such debts, dues, or sums of money (as the case may be), acquittances or other sufficient discharges.

Did they not have authority under this language to execute and receipt in the language which they did, as shown by the committee's report? Can there be any question in the mind of any man within the sound of my voice, notwithstanding the testimony of Messrs. Gillman, Son & Co., that they had full and ample authority to sign such receipts and acquittance?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And they are perfectly responsible; they were bankers, and men of business and experience?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, sir (reading)—

And generally to do all other acts and things in the law whatsoever needful and necessary to be done in and about the premises; for me and in my name to do, execute, and perform as fully and to all intents and purposes as I might or could do if personally present.

Now, then, we come to the opinion of the Supreme Court, and I submit that that tribunal is as competent as any tribunal in this land to pass upon the legal effect of evidence and to say when a fact is proven. What does the Supreme Court say?

It appears from the findings of the Court of Claims that the proper officer of the Navy Department estimated the same extra work and material at $116,111 which that court now estimates at $172,273.55, and that McCord accepted this sum, if the voucher is binding on him, as the full value of his labor and materials, and acknowledged it to be payment in full.

His name is signed to this receipt by Gillman, Son & Co., his attorneys; and it is insisted by counsel that they could only bind him for the sum received and not for its acceptance as full compensation. It is said in argument that they were bankers in New York and had no other power than to receipt for such sums as might be paid them.

Two powers of attorney are produced from McCord to Gillman, Son & Co., one of the date of November 24, 1863, and the other January 2, 1864. These are very full, and especially the latter. It makes them his true and lawful attorneys, "to sue for, recover, and receive all sums of money, debts, goods, wares, and other demands whatsoever," and especially payments that are or will be due on his contract for building the Etlah; "gives" them full power in and about the premises to have, use, and take all lawful ways and means in his name for the purposes aforesaid, and to make such acquittances or other sufficient discharges for me and in my name, and generally to do all other acts necessary and lawful to be done in and about the premises.

We are of opinion that this authorized Gillman, Son & Co. to accept payment of a voucher which declared on its face that it was the last, the full payment for the extra work done on the vessel, and thereby bind their principal to such acceptance.

Now, such is the opinion of the Supreme Court after having made a fair comparison of all the evidence and having examined the written instrument conferring the power upon Gillman, Son & Co. I submit that it makes but little difference what Mr. Gillman's opinion might have been as to the legal effect of that power of attorney when he came and testified before the committee of this House or before the Court of Claims. The evidence is against him. Now, the Supreme Court goes on to reason that this very voucher must have been sent to McCord himself, because it was executed in April. More than two weeks elapsed before it was presented for payment and paid, and it had ample time, in the usual course of business, to have gone from Washington to St. Louis and from there to New York, and the presumption is that that is what was done.

The Supreme Court, in its opinion, says:

It is certainly fair to suppose that McCord presented his own statement of the account to the navy officers, and the final approval of the Chief of the Bureau of Construction, at Washington, is dated April 26, 1866. The payment, as indorsed on that same voucher by the paymaster at New York, to Gillman, Son & Co., is dated May 11, 1866, which is just about a reasonable time for the voucher to have been received from Washington by McCord at St. Louis, and by him forwarded to Gillman, Son & Co., at New York, for collection. If this be the true history of the voucher, McCord is bound by his own actions, for the voucher, while in his hands, had on its face the clearest statement that the sum therein allowed was "the full and final payment on all extras, and in full for all claims and demands for that work," and if he forwarded it in this shape to his bankers to get the money on it, without protest, he must be bound by that statement in the voucher.

The Court of Claims finds that the delay in completing the vessel was caused by the changes ordered by the United States, and that, owing to the rise in the prices of the labor and materials on the work done under the original contract, and without reference to the changes, the cost of that work was increased to the builder $118,283.20.

The appellants asserted a claim for this amount also, which the court refused.

It is very clear that both parties contemplated the probability that the work would not be completed at the precise period of eight months from the date of the contract. They also contemplated that changes would be made in the construction of the battery. They made such provision for these matters as they deemed necessary for the protection of each party. For the reasonable cost and expenses of the changes made in the construction payment was to be made; but for any increase in the cost of the work not changed no provision was made. There was a provision for delay, by which the contractor was to submit to pay $4,500 for every month of that delay. This provision, the only one on that subject, if strictly enforced, might have made him a still greater loser; but it seems to have been waived. But we are very clear that without any such provision he must be held to have taken the risk of the prices of the labor and materials which he was bound to furnish, as every other contractor does who agrees to do a specified job at a fixed price. It is one of the elements which he takes into account when he makes his bargain, and he can not expect the other party to guarantee him against unfavorable changes in those prices.

If, on the contrary, something had occurred to bring about a depreciation in the price of labor and the price of material from the time the Government awarded this contract to McCord, do you suppose the Government could have recovered from the other contracting parties the difference between the price at the time the contract was entered and the lower prices which obtained when the contract was completed? Not by any manner of means. Every man taking a contract takes his chances on these things. They did it in that instance, and they are bound by it.

Again, I submit that this claimant here is not in the attitude of an innocent purchaser. The record nowhere shows that he ever paid one dollar for this claim or that he ever parted with anything of value for it. He, it is alleged, was a creditor of Mr. McCord at the time that McCord's assignee offered these claims for sale, and as a creditor purchased it. It was simply a substitution of credits. He did not change position or part with anything of value. Even if he had, I submit that he is in no better attitude than Mr. McCord would have been. This was not a negotiable instrument that people might purchase upon the market; it was simply an assignable chose in action, which every man would buy with his eyes wide open and take it subject to any defenses which may have existed between the Government and the assignor.

The assignor, Mr. McCord, two years prior to the sale of this pretended claim against the Government of the United States, had settled in full and received his pay for it, and I submit that this bill ought not to be favorably reported by this committee. At least I can not see my way clear to vote for it. I want to be fair about it, and if there are any good reasons why it should be favorably reported I am ready to listen to them and vote the other way.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire in what proceeding that testimony of Gillman & Sons was taken, whether in the proceeding that went to the Supreme Court or in the subsequent one before the Court of Claims?

Mr. McCARTHY. The Court of Claims was the first proceeding and the proceeding in the Supreme Court was the subsequent proceeding.

Mr. SPALDING. There were two proceedings in the Supreme Court.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes; but the Supreme Court simply reviewed the evidence taken in the other court.

Mr. SPALDING. This testimony of Gillman & Sons was in the second proceedings brought in the Court of Claims. The other ones have gone to the Supreme Court, and the second proceeding was thrown out of the Court of Claims on the ground that it did not have jurisdiction.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have only discussed the first proceeding.

Mr. SPALDING. And this testimony of Gillman & Sons has not been explained, or, rather, this receipt has not been explained by the testimony of Gillman & Sons in the proceeding that went to the Supreme Court, but was explained in the subsequent case in the Court of Claims.

Mr. McCARTHY. It has never been explained by Gillman & Sons. It is such testimony as is not susceptible of any explanation.

Mr. SPALDING. I am not discussing that feature of it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Here is a grand opportunity to save $174,000, which can be used by this Government for an honest, lawful, and laudable purpose. It will enable us to pay $1,000 each to 174 old soldiers or $174 each to 1,000 loyal defenders of the American flag who stood by our guns where the shot and shell fell thickest on many a bloody battlefield.

Let us do right. Let us save our money and use it liberally for legitimate purposes, instead of squandering it on spurious and fictitious claims.

Mr. OTJEN. Now, it does not make any difference to me whether this claim is favorably reported or not. All I care about is to do my duty to this claimant—the claim having been assigned to me. The facts are simply these: Owing to the Government changing its plan, it delayed these contractors. Prices went up, material went up, and labor went up. A United States engineer and a United States inspector have testified before the Court of Claims that the cost of this boat was nearly double what it was calculated to be in the first place. Nobody denies that this claimant signed a receipt which purported to be in full, but here is the case of Nathaniel McKay v. The United States, where an identical receipt was signed just the same as in this case. Congress sent that claim to the Court of Claims, and the claim was allowed and this man received $115,000; and the receipt was not held a bar. In the act passed and approved May 27, 1902, nine of these very boat claims are sent to the Court of Claims under bills similar to this. Now, I don't care whether this bill is reported favorably or not, but I do say that we ought to treat one man the same as we do another. If it is right to send these nine claimants to the Court of Claims, then it is right to send this one there. If it is not right to send this one, then Congress did wrong in sending these nine others. I believe that this claim, barring the amount, has just as much merit as the similar claims—just as much merit as these other claims, of which eighteen out of twenty Congress has already relieved. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PERKINS) there were—ayes 24, noes 44.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee recommend that the bill lie on the table. I will ask first whether that follows this action of the committee, as a matter of course?

The CHAIRMAN. As it stands now, the bill will go right back to the Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I shall insist upon my motion that the committee recommend that the bill lie on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with the recommendation that it lie on the table?

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

SPANISH WAR CLAIM OF IOWA.

Mr. HAUGEN. The chairman of the committee yields to me that I may call up the bill (H. R. 6345) for the relief of the State of Iowa.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the State of Iowa, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $21,293.53, to reimburse the said State for money and supplies furnished Iowa troops after being mustered into the United States service.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In lines 5, 6, and 7 strike out "$21,293.53" and insert "$20,545.70."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, this bill appropriates $20,545.70 to reimburse the State of Iowa for money and supplies furnished Iowa troops after being mustered into the United States service. In a report made by the Auditor for the War Department on a similar bill, introduced in the Fifty-seventh Congress on January 26, 1903, to the Secretary of the Treasury, he states:

In the official report, which will be furnished the governor of Iowa within a few days, it will be shown that the total disallowance of every nature amounts to $21,293.60.

Amount stated in this bill is $20,545.70, a difference of $747.90.

The amount stated in the bill is $747.90 less than the amount shown in the report made by the War Department and is accounted for in Adjutant-General Byer's letter, of Iowa, under date of February 11, 1903, and incorporated in this report, and I refer you to page 2 of this report.

I also call your attention to the Adjutant-General's statement in his letter of January 27, 1903, pages 2 and 3 of this report:

I personally had the supervision and paid all claims through my Department, and that before any bill was paid they had the approval of Capt. J. A. Olmstead, of the Ninth United States Cavalry, mustering officer, then on duty at Des Moines, Iowa. The great majority of the bills disallowed by the Auditor for the War Department were bills that were paid and contracted after the troops were mustered into the service.

I also call your attention to the statement made by the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Spaulding, in his letter of January 27, 1903, page 3 of this report:

I have the honor to inclose herewith the report made by the Auditor on the bill on the 26th instant, showing that in the settlement of claims of States against the United States for reimbursement on account of expenditures made in the war with Spain, it has been uniformly held that expenditures for accounts of officers and men after muster into the United States service were not a proper charge, under the act of July 8, 1898, and amendments thereto, and were therefore disallowed.

Respectfully,

O. L. SPAULDING,
Acting Secretary.

I also call attention to Acting Auditor Seeds's statement, of the War Department, page 5 of this report:

By an examination of the statement of differences arising in above settlement, transmitted on the 13th instant, you will observe that the item of rent of fair grounds referred to having been allowed in part you are advised that acceptance of the settlement would, under the section of act of July 31, 1894, preclude the State from further prosecution of said item before any of the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Respectfully,

E. P. SEEDS, Acting Auditor.

Act of July 8, 1898, directs that—

The Secretary of the Treasury pay to the governor of any State the reasonable costs, charges, and expenses that have been incurred by him in ordering the United States to raise the Volunteer Army in the existing war with Spain, by subsisting, clothing, supplying, equipping, paying, and transporting men of his State or Territory who were afterwards accepted in the Volunteer Army of the United States. Transportation paid for shall be only from the place of their enrollment for service to the place of their acceptance into the service by the United States mustering officer; and that the names of the men transported shall appear on the muster roll; and providing that such claims shall be settled upon proper vouchers to be filed and passed upon by the proper accounting officer of the Treasury.

I invite attention to the affidavits of Governor Shaw and Adjutant-General Byers, pages 3 and 4 of this report:

In the matter of supplies (that in your letter you say seems, from date of original bill, were furnished after muster into United States service) the facts are that the goods had been ordered before muster in and memorandum made out, but some bills were not made out until the 1st of the month following, the bills only being presented for payment once a month. All bills were approved by the United States mustering officer before payment was made by the State, and all payments were made by the State in good faith, supposing that the approval of the United States officers on duty, as mustering officers and quartermaster on part of the United States Government, was sufficient authority for reimbursement by the General Government.

The evidence goes to show that the money was expended in good faith; that the Adjutant-General had the supervision and paid all claims through his department, and that before any bills were paid they had the approval of Capt. J. C. Olmsted, of the Ninth United States Cavalry, mustering officer, then on duty at Des Moines, Iowa.

It appears that memorandums were made out, but bills were not made out until the 1st of the month following, the bills being presented for payment but once a month, and the understanding being that the approval of the United States mustering officer was sufficient authority for reimbursement by the General Government. It also appears (see p. 4)—

All the money expended by the State in aid of the United States Government in the mobilization, organization, and supplying the Iowa United States Volunteers was expended in good faith and bears the approval of the mustering officers, either Capt. J. A. Olmsted, Ninth United States Cavalry, or Maj. J. B. Guthrie, late Fifteenth United States Infantry, and no part of the materials were sold, but actually used up in the service of the United States and camp of mobilization for volunteers for the Spanish-American war at Des Moines, Iowa.

Further, that the adjutant-general, as acting quartermaster-general, had general and special supervision on the part of the State in all purchases, expenditures, and general management of the same for these troops, by the approval of the army officers of the United States on duty at this camp at date of purchase and disposal.

L. M. SHAW, Governor.
M. H. BYERS, Adjutant-General.

STATE OF IOWA, Polk County:

Subscribed and sworn to before me by L. M. Shaw, governor, and M. H. Byers, adjutant-general, of Iowa, this —— day of September, A. D. 1900.

C. T. JONES,
Clerk of the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa.

The act of July 8, 1898, was clearly for the purpose of reimbursing the States for money paid out by States in mustering into the United States service. Many of the claims have been disallowed by the War Department purely on technical grounds. No one complains of that. We fully appreciate that any officer of the War Department or elsewhere must act strictly within the law, and if there is any doubt as to the legality of a claim, or if the claims are a proper charge under certain laws, then it is necessary to disallow the claims; but the spirit of the law was to pay this and all similar claims, and it is now for Congress to carry out the intent of the law and not to stand on technicalities.

The governor of the State of Iowa, Leslie M. Shaw, and his honest and efficient aid, Adjutant-General Byers, whose integrity and patriotism have never been questioned—Governor Shaw recognized all over this land as one of America's foremost men, whose fame and popularity are not confined to the State of Iowa, but have swept beyond those; recognized as a lawyer, a man of vast experience in business affairs, supported by his able aid—have acted in good faith.

Now, then, suppose some irregularity occurred, and that some of this red-tape was dispensed with; some receipts had not been signed on the proper line, as indicated in some of the memorandums included in the itemized statement; and suppose that receipts were lost or not secured at all, and that part payment had been accepted on some claim, is that any reason for not paying this claim? Nobody questions the affidavit, the integrity, or the standing of these gentleman, or their capacity for business.

We were then at war with Spain, and I fancy the question was not so much with these men as to strictly complying with all the formalities and red-tape under the rules and regulations of any department.

Iowa had been called upon to furnish her share of the 125,000 volunteers called for April 23, 1898, and subsequent calls. The question uppermost in the minds of these men was not only how to furnish the men, but how to furnish the best men, and how to get them to the front the quickest, as well as to provide for their comfort. And let me say to you that the volunteers were furnished promptly and cheerfully. You got the best we had: they were the very flower of manhood, the very cream of this country; wherever then went, whatever they encountered, they conducted themselves like men, and contributed their part in bringing about the glorious results.

Will any Member of this House say by vote or action that this or any other State shall not be reimbursed every dollar paid or incurred in the muster into service, or a single dollar paid for the comfort and protection for any one of these men in health or sickness? I believe not. We all glory in the heroic deeds of these gallant men who have brought so much fame and luster to America's name and are anxious to show a just appreciation for the noble sacrifices which have been made for this country. In all our direful hours, whether during the war with Spain or any other conflict, a sacrifice which includes, in addition to the sufferings at home, the expenditure of money by State or individual, the loss of the brave men who now lie beneath the sod and to whose memory we will ever bow with reverence and respect.

The American people believe in a just recognition of the services rendered, either by our soldiers, our States, or any individual.

Gentlemen, here is an opportunity to show your appreciation of services by the State of Iowa and her people.

This bill has been carefully considered by the Committee on War Claims, and has been unanimously reported both in the Fifty-seventh and Fifty-eighth Congresses.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks for the purpose of printing a few tables in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. The tables referred to are as follows:

F. E. RITTMAN, Auditor.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, the bill as amended was laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

INDIANA STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. MAHON. I call up the bill (H. R. 7402) for the relief of the Indiana State board of agriculture.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army the circumstances, character, and extent of the alleged use, occupation, and damage by the United States military authorities, for Government purposes during the war with Spain, of the buildings and grounds of the Indiana State board of agriculture, and the actual value of the use, occupation, and damage to same, and to find and award and to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury what amount, if any, is equitably due to said Indiana State board of agriculture from the United States as the reasonable value of such use, occupation, and damage; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay said State board of agriculture, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount, if any, so found to be due from the United States; and the acceptance by said board of agriculture of any sum paid under the provisions hereof shall be in full satisfaction of all claim of every name and nature for said use, occupation, and damage, or in any manner arising or growing out of the same.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, it appears by the report that this claim was not filed in time under the act of June 6, 1900. What liability does that act create?

Mr. MAHON. That act provided that the governors of the States should file these claims under that act. Through a misunderstanding or oversight this claim was not filed within the time prescribed by the act.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the act prescribe under what terms the Government shall be liable?

Mr. MAHON. Oh, yes; that is all settled under the terms of the act.

Mr. PAYNE. Why should not this bill be so limited in its terms as to provide that this claim be not paid unless the Government would have been liable under the terms of that act?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Payment under this bill will be confined to the liability which accrued under the original act. This claim would probably have been considered and paid within the time prescribed, but for the fact that the members and officers of the State board of agriculture were scattered all over the State, and this matter was therefore neglected. When this bill was first presented in the Fifty-seventh Congress it called for a direct appropriation; but as this is an unliquidated claim the committee believed that the War Department should first investigate and ascertain the amount due from the United States to this corporation. That is really all that the bill carries. Although it directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay this claim if the amount be found equitably due, yet I take it, additional action would be required to pay the claim.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think so; there is, I believe, a general appropriation for the payment of such claims.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I do not know as to that. But at all events there can certainly be no objection to the Government paying whatever the Secretary of the Treasury may find to be due.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman assent to an amendment providing that the Secretary of the Treasury pay whatever may be found due under the general terms of the act of June 6, 1900, so that we may not by this bill enlarge the scope of that act?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I am not familiar with the terms of the act. I have not examined it carefully.

Mr. PAYNE. Nor have I. You refer to it in your report.

Mr. MAHON. I think it perfectly right that the bill should be limited, so that under it payment shall only be made for such liability as may have been created by the act of June 6, 1900, and the amendments thereto.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. All that the committee propose and all that the persons interested in this bill desire is that they shall be treated exactly as other people have been treated under similar circumstances.

Mr. PAYNE. The report states that this claim was filed in the War Department under the provisions of the act of June 6, 1900, but after the time prescribed for filing claims of this character had expired. Now, I have not the slightest objection to extending the time for payment, but we do not want to enlarge the scope of the statute.

Mr. MAHON. Such an amendment as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] proposes can do no harm.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I have no objection to such an amendment if the gentleman thinks there is any danger that should be guarded against.

Mr. MAHON. I ask that the bill be read again for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill will be again reported.

The bill was read again.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, where the words occur there, "due from the United States," I move to insert "under the provisions of the act of June 6, 1900," as an amendment.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I do not deem the amendment necessary, but I have no objection to it.

Mr. MAHON. That is all right. What is the date of that act?

Mr. PAYNE. June 6, 1900, and acts amendatory thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the words "United States," insert "under the act of June 6, 1900, and amendments thereto."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the appropriation. I do that on behalf of the gentleman's colleague [Mr. HEMENWAY], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I believe this claim ought to come back here to Congress for an appropriation. Of course, if it comes back here with a report in its favor, there is no question but what the appropriation will be made.

Mr. MAHON. It will come back as an adjudicated account and will go into the deficiency bill.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. My impression was that this did not carry a direct appropriation anyhow.

Mr. PAYNE. It directs the payment of the money out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I am willing that that should be done provided the matter can be safely adjudicated.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I move to strike out the words appropriating the money, directing it to be paid out of any money not otherwise appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "damage," on page 2, line 2.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I am satisfied to accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HEPBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Parkinson, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 2818. An act permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River at or near the village of Sauk Rapids, Benton County, Minn.;

S. R. 11. Joint resolution to authorize certain officers of the Treasury Department to audit and certify claims of certain counties of Arizona;

S. R. 37. Joint resolution providing for the editions to be printed of the annual and special reports of the Librarian of Congress;

S. 3015. An act to provide for an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania; and

S. 707. An act to amend an act entitled "An act providing the terms and places of holding the courts of the United States in the district of Minnesota, and for other purposes," approved April 26, 1890.

GEORGE W. SAULPAW.

The committee resumed its session.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 1513) for the relief of the estate of George W. Saulpaw.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of George W. Saulpaw the sum of $7,000, in full compensation for the steamer Alfred Robb, taken by the United States for the use of the Government during the late war of the rebellion.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, this is the bill of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HASKINS], and I yield to him.

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Chairman, this measure has been before Congress from the Forty-fifth up to the present time. It has always received a favorable report, either from the Senate or the House, and in the Fifty-sixth Congress it passed both Houses, but not in time to receive the approval of the President. In the Fifty-seventh Congress it was reported favorably again by the House.

In the Forty-sixth Congress Senator TELLER made a report upon the bill, which was very full and exhaustive, and if my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] or any other Member has any question about the merits of the case, I should like to have that report read.

Mr. PAYNE. It seems to be a pretty old matter, and I think the House ought to have some information on it.

Mr. HASKINS. It has been reported favorably at every session, either by one House or the other, and it passed both Houses in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. MAHON. It has never been vetoed. It simply reached the President too late.

Mr. PAYNE. I have not been able to find out what the bill is about.

Mr. HASKINS. I will ask the Clerk to read the report of Senator TELLER, commencing on page 2 of the committee report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read it in the time of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George W. Saulpaw, have considered the same and report:

This case was before the committee during the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress, and your committee made the following report, which was submitted to the Senate June 12, 1878. Your committee have examined the case and readopt the report, which is as follows:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George W. Saulpaw, have considered the same and report:

"The petitioner has always been a loyal citizen. Before the war he was a member of a firm who were engaged in building railroad bridges. They built bridges over the Cumberland River at Nashville and Clarksburg, and also some other small bridges. They built a bridge over the Tennessee at Danville, which was completed in November, 1861.

"Said firm purchased a steamboat called the Alfred Robb, in March, 1860, for the transportation of stone, timber, etc., needed in their bridge building, for which they paid $8,500. November 21, 1861, said firm dissolved, and petitioner became sole owner of said boat, for which he allowed $5,500. The rebels had then blockaded the Tennessee River near Fort Henry, below said bridge, and the petitioner was unable to get the boat out of the river. He thereupon began running her as a packet from Danville to Eastport, Miss., a distance of about 175 miles, and continued this employment until about February 13, 1862, when the rebels seized her near Eastport by force and used her as a transport until April 10, 1862. The boat was then lying in Little Bear Creek, near Tuscumbia, Ala. The rebel General Walker sent orders to have said boat burned and destroyed, as he was about to evacuate the country. The pilot and clerk, who were loyal men, and who had remained on board while she was in the rebel service, succeeded in evading the order and in running the boat down the stream, where she was concealed at a place called Coyers Island until April 22, 1862, when she was taken by the Union gunboat Tyler.

"She was then taken to Cairo, Ill., and converted into a gunboat, used as such during the war, and was retained by the United States till the summer of 1865, when she was sold at Mound City at the great auction of the Mississippi gunboat squadron, and brought $9,200. The pilot entered into the Government service, and so remained through the war. The clerk and pilot were in the petitioner's employ, he designing to retain them, and paying them, deeming that his boat would be safer and his chance of securing it better by so doing. They intended to save and secure the boat for the owner, and had actually and completely delivered her from rebel control when she was taken by the United States gunboat. The circumstances of the delivery of the boat are proved by the testimony of the pilot, whose character and trustworthiness are established by the evidence of several United States officers with whom he served. The date and circumstances of the capture fully appear in the report of Lieutenant Gwin, commanding the gunboat Tyler, dated April 23, 1862, and forwarded to the Navy Department by Flag-Officer Foote, by report dated April 26, 1862.

"The boat was of 80 tons, in good running order, as appears by the report of the officer who captured her. She is fully described in the other evidence, and we think was worth nearly her original cost when appropriated by the United States. Upon these facts we hold that all the owner's original right and title to the boat had revested in him, wholly purged from any effects of the impressment by the rebels. The owner's agents in his behalf and by his authority had completed the escape of the boat from rebel hands. This is not the case of a recapture by our Government of property of its loyal citizens which the enemy had taken and put to a military use. It is the case of the full and complete retaking of the property by the owner himself. It is as if the crew of a merchantman captured by the enemy at sea had risen in the night and retaken the vessel. In such case we conceive the title of the owner would completely revest."

The foregoing narrative, so far as relates to the time, place, and circumstances of the taking by the United States of the Alfred Robb, is as well established by public official records as any fact can be. Yet, on the 15th of July, 1862, an information was filed in the district court of the United States for the southern district of Illinois on the relation of George D. Wise as informer against the steamer Alfred Robb, her engines, furniture, tackle, etc., setting forth "that on the 15th day of July, A. D. 1862, there was seized on the Mississippi River, below Cairo, and brought into this district the steamer Alfred Robb, her engines, furniture, tackle, etc. Said seizure was made by George D. Wise. Said seizure was made for the reason that said property was being used by and with the knowledge and consent of the owner in aiding the present rebellion, contrary to the act of August 6, 1861, and being so used it has become forfeited." Every one of these allegations was false. The steamer was not seized July 15, 1862, but passed into the possession of the United States in April. She was not seized on the Mississippi River, and was not seized for the reason that she was being used, by the knowledge or consent of the owner, in aiding the rebellion. Wise never seized her at all. On this libel notice was ordered by publication fourteen days in a newspaper printed in Springfield and by posting of a copy of the monition near the place of trial.

Wise was a captain and assistant quartermaster with the United States gunboat flotilla to which the Alfred Robb then belonged.

A writ of attachment and monition issued directing the marshal to attach the property, etc., and to detain the same until the further order of the court. The marshal made return as follows:

"I hereby certify that on the 7th day of August, A. D. 1862, I have by virtue of this writ attached the within-named steamer Alfred Robb and made due proclamation.

"D. L. PHILLIPS, United States Marshal,
"By ISAAC KEYS, Deputy."

To which is annexed the following receipt:

"OFFICE OF GUNBOAT FLOTILLA,
"Cairo, Ill., August 7, 1862.

"Received from D. L. Phillips, United States marshal, southern district of Illinois, one steamboat called Alfred Robb, which has this day been attached by the said David L. Phillips as aforesaid, the said boat being now in the service of the United States as a gunboat on the western waters, which I agree to deliver as hereafter may be decreed by the judge of the district court aforesaid, if in my power and consistent with my duty to the United States.

"GEO. D. WISE,
"Captain and Assistant Quartermaster."

Upon these proceedings a decree of sale was made, and the boat bid off by George D. Wise aforesaid, in behalf of the United States, for the sum of $4,000, of which the court decreed $12.50 to the clerk, $96.82 to the marshal, $100 to the district attorney, and ordered the balance, $3,790.38, to be divided between the United States and George D. Wise, "the informer herein."

The owner of the boat had no notice or knowledge of the proceedings.

There was no actual proof of the allegations of the information, the record alleging a proclamation for all persons interested to appear, a default, and order "that the allegations of the libel be taken as true against said property."

A request was made, at the close of the war, to the Quartermaster-General for return of the Alfred Robb, and for such information as the records of the Department might show as to the history of these transactions. The following answer was returned:

"QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., September 18, 1865.

"SIR: In reply to your letter of the 20th and 31st of July last, with reference to the claim of G. W. Saulpaw, esq., for the return to him of the steamer Alfred Robb, captured by the western gunboat flotilla in February, 1862, in the Tennessee River, you are respectfully informed that this boat was sold by the United States marshal under a decree of confiscation, having been captured while being used for insurrectionary purposes, and was purchased by the Navy Department and placed under the charge of Capt. Geo. D. Wise, the then quartermaster in charge of the property and accounts of the flotilla, and by him transferred to the Navy Department October 1, 1862. You are informed that it is beyond the power of this Department to assist you in the settlement of this account.

"You are respectfully referred to D. L. Phillips, esq., United States marshal, Springfield, Ill., for any further information concerning this vessel.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"By order Quartermaster-General:

"GEO. D. WISE,
"Colonel in Charge Third D. W.

"R. J. ATKINSON, Esq.,
"Washington, D. C."

The following letter, of which the original is before the committee, is found in the files of that office, which is evidently a first draft of an answer to the foregoing request, from which we think the nature of the transaction can be fairly inferred:

"QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., July 24, 1865.

"SIR: Your letter of July 20, transmitting evidence, etc., pertaining to claim of G. W. Saulpaw, esq., of Tennessee, for compensation for the steamboat Alfred Robb, has been referred to me by the Quartermaster-General.

"Your are respectfully informed that the case of the steamer Alfred Robb was duly adjudicated before the United States court for the southern district of Illinois, at Springfield, some time in the year 1863. Due notice was given at that time to claimants to show why she should not be condemned, having been used for insurrectionary purposes, but if any evidence was presented it was not considered satisfactory to the court, as she was condemned and sold by the United States marshal, and, after deducting expenses, one-half ($1,895.19) went to the informer and the other half to the United States Treasury.

"Please read the above and see if it is correct.

"How did the Robb come into our possession after the capture? Who paid for her at the sale of confiscation? I do not remember how I came into possession of the $1,895.19 given me by the marshal. Whom did he get it from? As although I bid the boat in, yet I do not remember to have paid any money for her, and yet received a portion of the sale. If she was sold by the United States marshal and I bid for her, I should have paid the amount and taken a voucher from the marshal. Can you explain all this, for it has entirely passed out of my mind and I have no time to hunt up papers, and Mr. Blount is away?

"Yours,

"GEO. D. WISE.

"R. J. ATKINSON, Esq.,
"Washington, D. C."

It is evident that the decree of the district court was entirely without foundation in fact, and the findings upon which it proceeded were erroneous. Under these circumstances, if the decree were technically valid until reversed by proper proceeding, and constituted a binding judgment in rem, we do not think the Government ought to avail itself of such a technical defense to avoid repayment to the true owner of the proceeds of his property now in the Treasury.

But the decree is upon its face wholly erroneous and void.

It is settled that under the act of August 6, 1861, as well as under the later similar acts, there must have been an actual seizure of the property by the marshal to make a decree of confiscation valid. "The marshal must take the property under his actual custody and control." (Pelham v. Way, 15 Wallace, 202; Brown v. Kennedy, ib., 591; Miller v. United States, 11 ib., 268; Pelham v. Rose, 9 ib., 103.) The property must remain in the custody of the marshal, so that he can deliver it to the highest bidder, if it be purchased under the decree of sale. But the return itself sufficiently shows that no such seizure was or could have been made. The gunboat was in the actual service of the United States, in command of an officer who retained possession. The receipt of Captain Wise, made part of the return, declares that "the boat is now in the service of the United States as a gunboat on the western waters, which I agree to deliver as hereafter may be decreed by the judge of the district court aforesaid, if in my power and consistent with my duty to the United States." It clearly was not in his power or consistent with his duty to make such delivery. This consent or receipt no more transferred the possession of the gunboat from the United States to the marshal than would a like document executed by the cook or cabin boy.

We think, therefore, the owner's title to his boat has never been lawfully divested.

The boat cost the firm, of which petitioner was a member, $8,500 in March, 1860. In November, 1861, she was valued at $5,500 in the division of the property of the company. She sold for $9,200 in 1865, at a large and extensively advertised auction sale of such property. But it does not appear that the alterations made in her by the United States may not have enhanced her value. The sale to Wise for $4,000 was nothing more than mere form, even if a form were really gone through. The claimant is not entitled to interest nor to compensation for the use of his boat under the rules uniformly applied to like cases. Under all the circumstances we recommend the payment to the claimant of the sum of $7,000, and report a bill to that effect.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the report seems to be very clear and complete, and I shall take great pleasure in voting for the bill.

Mr. HASKINS. I ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

BOWMAN ACT CLAIMS.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on War Claims has passed a resolution authorizing me to call up the bill H. R. 9548. This bill I will put in charge of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON], who reported the bill. It contains the findings of the court under the Bowman Act. It is purely findings and nothing else, and the bill has been very carefully prepared by a subcommittee.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Is that the omnibus bill?

Mr. MAHON. It is what we call the "findings-of-fact bill."

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I do not wish, and do not propose, to offer any obstruction or objection to the omnibus claims bill, because I am interested in that bill myself; but I will ask unanimous consent before that bill is taken up to take up House bill 2849, for the relief of St. John's Masonic Lodge, Newbern, N. C. The reason I ask this is because it is different from other bills, having passed both Houses of Congress, and it is res adjudicata. It has the seal of approval of the Fifty-sixth Congress, and we can pass it in a few minutes. If you will pass it, I will promise not to object to the passage of any other bill of equal merit.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 2849. Is there objection?

Mr. MAHON. I object.

Mr. PAYNE. Regular order.

Mr. MAHON. I would like the gentleman's bill to pass, but I am obliged to carry out the instructions of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Understand I am not opposing the omnibus bill, but the Masonic claim bill has been reported favorably to this Congress and passed the Fifty-sixth Congress after full debate, and it will only take a few minutes to pass it now.

Mr. PAYNE. The regular order is the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is called for. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. MAHON. I move to take up House bill 9548 and proceed to its consideration. The committee has instructed me to make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the committee now take up House bill 9548.

Mr. HEPBURN. I raise the point of order against that motion. It seems to me the order on the Calendar is the way to consider the bills.

Mr. MAHON. It is entirely within the power of the committee to take up any bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think it is in the power of the committee to do that under the order for the call of committees, but not under this order.

Mr. MAHON. The rule provides that the Committee of the Whole can take up any bill on the Private Calendar. There is no question about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the rule so provides.

The question was taken on the consideration of the bill; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. PAYNE. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 13.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9548) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies, reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill and read to page 4, line 15.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. The bill must first be read; and I make that point of order.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be further dispensed with.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I am informed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if we give unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill he will immediately move that the committee do rise.

Mr. MAHON. I do this so as to get the bill read. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, as we could not get to the second reading of the bill to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAHON. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills on the Private Calendar and had directed him to report back the bill H. R. 201 with the recommendation that it be laid on the table; and also sundry other bills, some with and some without amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills do pass; and also that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9548 and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bills and amendments reported.

Mr. PAYNE. Ask unanimous consent. It is not in order to make that motion.

Mr. MAHON. I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on the bills and amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the previous question may be ordered upon the various bills and amendments to their final passage. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LIGHT-DRAFT MONITOR ETLAH.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 201) for the relief of the contractor or his legal representatives for the construction of the light-draft monitor Etlah, with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be laid on the table.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4094) to correct the military record of George Moltz; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4095) for the relief of Julius A. Kaiser; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McENERY introduced a bill (S. 4096) for the relief of Louis J. Souer, collector of internal revenue for the collection district of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 4097) to establish in the Department of Agriculture a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Public Highways, and to provide for national aid in the improvement of the public roads; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LATIMER introduced a bill (S. 4098) to establish in the Department of Agriculture a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Public Highways, and to provide for national aid in the improvement of the public roads; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CULLOM (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 40) adjusting the rank of Maj. Joseph W. Wham, United States Army (on the retired list), and making restitution for certain pay and allowances withheld; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. PETTUS submitted an amendment directing the Secretary of War to pay to Rittenhouse Moore out of the unexpended balance of the appropriation made in the act of March 3, 1899, for improving the Potomac River the sum of $3,653.05, being the amount stated and claimed by him for overwidth dredging in the Potomac River below Washington, D. C., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEWART submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,000 for paving Q street, between Twenty-second and Twenty-third streets NW., District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAPP submitted an amendment proposing to fix the salary of the consul at An-tung, Manchuria, at $4,000 per annum instead of at $3,500, intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to fix the salary of the consul at An-tung, Manchuria, at $4,000 per annum instead of at $3,500, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAIRBANKS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $600 for clerk hire at the consulate at Bahia, Brazil, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for an illustrated description of the Sherman statue from $300 to $600 and making the same applicable to a description of the ceremonies and incidents attending the unveiling of the statue, intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

ISTHMIAN CANAL ROUTES.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That the hearings had before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals in January and February, 1902, in relation to isthmian canal routes be reprinted.

RECESS APPOINTMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 114, by Mr. TILLMAN, instructing the Secretary of the Treasury to send to the Senate information in regard to the appointment of William D. Crum as collector of the port of Charleston, S. C.

Mr. TILLMAN. In connection with that resolution I should like to have the one I offered yesterday brought up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution submitted by the Senator from South Carolina.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 120, by Mr. TILLMAN, authorizing and directing the Committee on the Judiciary to report what constitutes a recess of the Senate, etc.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let it be read.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. TILLMAN, as follows:

Whereas Article II, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States provides:

"The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint * * * all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law;"

And further:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of the session;"

And

Whereas it is known that certain officers appointed during the recess of Congress from March 4 last to November 9, and whose appointments were not confirmed by the Senate, are now in possession of and exercising the powers and functions of said offices: Be it

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of the Senate be, and it is hereby, authorized and instructed to report to the Senate—

First. What constitutes a "recess of the Senate," and what are the powers and limitations of the Executive in making appointments in such cases.

Second. What legislation is necessary to prevent the holding of an office by any person or persons whose commissions issue or are held by Executive exercise of unlawful authority, if any there be.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from South Carolina permit me to ask him a question as to the order of business?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. I have just come in from attendance on the work of the committee. I do not know how the resolution comes up. Has it been reached in the order of morning business?

Mr. TILLMAN. In regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a resolution coming over from a previous day.

Mr. HALE. It is a very important resolution, directing the Judiciary Committee to report on the question of a constructive recess. If the resolution can be passed at once, as I should hope it might be, I shall not make any interference. But if it is to be discussed, for two reasons I should like to have the Senator let it go over until to-morrow morning, retaining its place—one being that I desire very much, representing the Committee on Appropriations, of which the Senator is a member, to have the urgent deficiency appropriation bill passed this morning, and the other being that if the Senator's resolution is to be discussed, I should like to have an opportunity of examining some of the facts in relation to it, because I might want to participate in the discussion, and I have been so busy about items of appropriation that I have had no opportunity to look into it. That, of course, will not apply if the resolution can pass without debate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course I can not tell how much discussion will arise upon the resolution or under its consideration.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. It may be assumed that the resolution will not pass without debate.

Mr. HALE. Then I should like to appeal to the Senator from South Carolina for both reasons that I have given, first, the desire of passing the urgent deficiency appropriation bill at once, and next, that Senators are not prepared—I am not—to discuss the matter this morning, that he allow the resolution to go over, holding its place and coming up to-morrow morning just as it did this morning.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I am always ready to yield to any request of my friend the Senator from Maine; and while I should like to have the resolution disposed of, and have very little to say myself unless discussion shall provoke discussion, I shall give way with the understanding that to-morrow we shall have no further delay. I have already been giving way for two or three days, and I am willing to give way again to conform with the desire of Senators who wish to examine the question, and let us see if we can not all agree on something about this matter.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is very liberal about it. I hope the resolution will go over on these terms, that it shall come up to-morrow morning exactly as it came up this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator asks that the resolutions may go over, lying on the table, without prejudice.

Mr. TILLMAN. And that they shall retain all the privileges they now have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TORPEDO BOATS AND TORPEDO-BOAT DESTROYERS.

Mr. HALE. I move that Senate Document No. 112, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, being a statement relative to cost of torpedo boats and torpedo-boat destroyers, authorized by the act of May 4, 1898, in connection with the relief of the contractors therefor, together with certain other data in order attached, be reprinted and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

RELATIONS WITH NEW GRANADA OR COLOMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. HALE, was, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of January 22, 1904, I transmit herewith reports from the Acting Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Navy, with accompanying papers.

The correspondence since November 16, 1902, referred to in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which has not already been transmitted to the Senate, has no reference to the matters covered by the resolution and deals with military movements, and it is for that reason deemed incompatible with the public interest to make it public at this time.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, February 3, 1904.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 1513) for the relief of the estate of George W. Saulpaw;

A bill (H. R. 1700) for the relief of the legal representatives of Warren Mitchell, deceased;

A bill (H. R. 3875) for the relief of Dr. Thomas J. Cowan, deceased;

A bill (H. R. 6345) for the relief of the State of Iowa; and

A bill (H. R. 7402) for the relief of the Indiana State board of agriculture.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10954, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10954) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for prior years, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I make the usual request in regard to action on the committee amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the amendments of the committee shall first receive consideration. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Department of State," on page 2, after line 9, to insert:

For additional amount to enable the President to cooperate through diplomatic channels with the Governments of Mexico, China, Japan, and other countries, for the purpose set forth in the message of the President and accompanying notes submitted to Congress January 29, 1903, and printed as Senate Document No. 119, second session Fifty-seventh Congress, $25,000; and the commission appointed for this purpose shall terminate July 1, 1904.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 24, to increase the appropriation for contingent expenses to the Department of State from $2,000 to $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 3, to insert:

For the purchase of two horses for the official use of the Department of State, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Foreign intercourse," on page 3, line 22, to increase the appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for "Contingent expenses, foreign missions," including all objects mentioned under this title of appropriation in the diplomatic and consular appropriation act for the fiscal year 1904, from $15,000 to $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 12, to insert:

For expenses, not salaries, of inspection of consulates, to be expended under the direction of the Department of State, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 5, after the word "annum," to insert "consul at Dalny, Manchuria, at the rate of $3,500 per annum;" and in line 6, after the word "all," to strike out "$3,111.27" and insert "$4,569.60;" so as to make the clause read:

Consular service in Manchuria: For the following for the balance of the fiscal year 1904: Consul-general at Mukden, Manchuria, at the rate of $4,000 per annum; consul at An-tung, Manchuria, at the rate of $3,500 per annum; consul at Dalny, Manchuria, at the rate of $3,500 per annum; in all, $4,569.60, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Treasury Department," on page 6, after line 11, to insert:

For postage required to prepay matter addressed to Postal Union countries, and for postage for the Treasury Department, for the fiscal year 1903, $481.25.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 10, to insert:

Office of the Treasurer: For the following additional employees for the balance of the fiscal year 1904, namely: For one clerk of class 3; one clerk of class 2; one clerk of class 1; nine expert counters, at the rate of $800 per annum each; one laborer; and one foreman pressman at the rate $1,500 per annum; in all, $6,025.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 1 on page 10, the amendment under the heading "Louisiana Purchase Exposition."

Mr. BAILEY. I desire at this point to inquire whether it is necessary to make points of order as the bill is being read or to reserve them?

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, the practice in the Senate is different from that of the House. Points of order need not be reserved.

Mr. BAILEY. A point of order can be made at any time.

Mr. HALE. No; a point of order can be made on any amendment that is offered when it is presented, and it can be made to any part of the bill as it is read.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that the bill is being read now for amendment.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be allowed to make a statement, I understand that the bill is now as in Committee of the Whole Senate, and that when it is reported to the Senate, after it has got through the Committee of the Whole, all points of order are open that would be open upon the bill as originally presented.

Mr. BAILEY. I wanted to reserve my right to make a point of order against this particular amendment.

Mr. HALE. As the Senator from Massachusetts suggests, it can be made at either time.

Mr. BAILEY. Just so that I can make it before it is closed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations which was on page 10, beginning with line 1, to insert the following:

Louisiana Purchase Exposition: For the purpose of further aiding in the payment of the cost of the construction, completion, and opening of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, at the city of St. Louis, on or before April 30, 1904, $4,600,000; said sum to be paid to the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company on the request of the president of said company, and in amounts as follows: One million dollars upon the passage of this act, $1,000,000 during the month of February, $1,000,000 during the month of March, $1,000,000 during the month of April, and $600,000 during the month of May, 1904: Provided, That of said sums $100,000 shall be paid by said Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company to, or on the order of, the board of lady managers of said exposition for such purposes as said board of lady managers shall approve and at such times as said board of lady managers shall request the same.

That to insure the application of all said moneys to the purposes for which the same is appropriated, the Secretary of the Treasury shall appoint a suitable person or persons whose duty it shall be to supervise the disbursement of the same when paid, as herein provided, and to make a full and complete report thereof to him as he may require: Provided further, That the amount hereby appropriated when paid to the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company, as herein provided, shall constitute an indebtedness of the said company to the Government of the United States and shall be repaid by said company to the Treasury of the United States. That for the purpose of protecting the Government and insuring the repayment of said sum of $4,600,000, the Government shall have a first lien upon the gross receipts of said exposition company from all paid admissions to the grounds of said exposition and from all moneys received from concessions. That before any part of this appropriation is paid, as hereinbefore provided, the said Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company shall execute, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, an instrument in writing giving and securing to the Government a first lien upon its said gross receipts, and said exposition company shall at the same time guarantee to the Government, under suitable penalties, that the said gross receipts are then entirely free from liens, mortgages, or other incumbrances, and that it will not pledge or in any way incumber or dispose of said receipts so as to injure or affect the right of the Government to first receive therefrom the amount to be returned to the Treasury, as herein provided.

The said Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company shall repay into the Treasury of the United States the said sum of $4,600,000, as follows: On the 15th day of June, 1904, said Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company shall report to the Secretary of the Treasury in detail the total amount of all said gross receipts received by said company from June 1 to June 15, both inclusive, and 40 per cent of such receipts shall then be paid by said company to the Secretary of the Treasury as a part payment for the loan to said company herein provided for, and after that and during the continuance of said exposition a like report in detail shall be made on the 1st day of each month and upon the 15th day of each month, and in the same manner 40 per cent of the gross receipts of said company shall be paid to the Secretary of the Treasury, as before provided, until the entire amount of $4,600,000 shall have been paid to the Secretary of the Treasury in satisfaction of said loan: Provided further, That if at any time after said exposition company has received the amount hereby appropriated it makes default in the application or in the repayment of said sum, or any part thereof, as herein required, then, and in that case, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to supervise the collection and take possession of all said gross receipts and continue such supervision and possession until the full sum of said $4,600,000 has been collected and repaid into the Treasury of the United States, as herein provided. In accepting the amount hereby appropriated the said Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company shall be taken and held to agree to all the terms and conditions upon which the same is made and upon which the same is to be repaid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is an amendment to the amendment in order at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move to amend the amendment by adding at the end the following proviso:

Provided, That range cattle and halter-broke cattle from all sections of the United States, whether above or below the quarantine line established by the Secretary of Agriculture, may be exhibited at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the following letter from the Secretary af Agriculture on the subject of the amendment to the amendment be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., November 12, 1903.

Mr. LOUIS J. WORTHAM,
Oriental Hotel, Dallas, Tex.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation concerning the exhibition of Texas cattle at the St. Louis Exposition, I would say that the matter is not within the jurisdiction of this Department, but I should of course be willing to make any representations regarding the exhibition which appeared to me to be desirable. If an arrangement could be made by which the cattle from below the quarantine line could be kept entirely separate from those coming from above that line, and be shown in different show rings, I should recommend that the southern cattle be allowed to go for exhibition under such conditions. I think, however, it would be taking too much risk to allow northern and southern animals to go to the same grounds or be exhibited in the same show ring. The Department would do anything possible in the way of inspection to facilitate the exhibition or to lessen the danger.

Very respectfully,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 2, to insert:

Paris Exposition: The following provisions of the deficiency appropriation act approved July 1, 1902, namely: "To complete the unfinished work of the late United States Commission to the International Exposition at Paris in 1900, and to defray the expenses of distributing the medals and diplomas awarded to exhibitors from the United States, to be expended under the direction of the President, there is hereby appropriated for such purposes such sums of money as have been covered into the Treasury as proceeds derived from the sale of furniture or other property used by the Commission, and to continue available during the fiscal year 1903, $13,875.21," are hereby further continued and the appropriation made available from the end of said fiscal year 1903 to September 30, 1903.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, after line 15, to insert:

Reimbursement to the Independent Line steamers, of Tampa, Fla.: To pay the balance due to the Independent Line steamers, of Tampa, Fla., in full settlement of all claims said steamer line may have against the United States for damages to the steamer Manatee, due to a collision with the U. S. S. Hillsboro in Tampa Bay, Florida, on the night of November 18, 1901, $720.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to offer an amendment, on page 21, in line 24, after the word "cents"——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it an amendment to a committee amendment?

Mr. HOPKINS. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proper time has not been reached for offering individual amendments. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations are first to be considered.

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Public buildings," on page 22, line 20, to increase the appropriation for Treasury building, Washington, D. C., special repairs, etc., from $8,000 to $12,000.

For fuel for public schools, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 7, to insert:

For the purchase and repair of tools, machinery, material, and apparatus to be used in connection with instruction in manual training, and for incidental expenses connected therewith, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 11, to insert:

For amount required for the construction of an open underground drain for the Congress Heights engine house, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 14, to insert:

For amount required for deepening well, Congress Heights engine house, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 19, to insert:

Toward carrying out the provisions of the acts of Congress providing for the elimination of grade crossings and the construction of a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, approved February 12, 1901, and February 28, 1903, for purchase or condemnation of the land necessary for the plaza and new streets, and for reconstructing, grading, and paving, together with the necessary incidental work in connection therewith, the streets, avenues, and ways changed in line of grade or newly created under the provisions of said acts, this sum to be expended under the provisions of said acts, and to continue available until expended, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "War Department," on page 30, after line 16, to insert:

The accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby directed, in the settlement of the accounts of George W. Baird, major and paymaster, United States Army, and lieutenant-colonel and deputy paymaster-general, United States Army, to allow such credits for payments, not to exceed $679.03, as may be recommended under authority of the Secretary of War by the Paymaster-General of the Army.

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $40,000.

For fitting up car buildings corner First and B streets SW. for the use of the folding room of the Senate, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offer as an amendment an item coming from the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives, which has been omitted in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 70, after line 22, it is proposed to insert:

For wrapping paper, pasteboard, paste, twine, newspaper wrappers, and other necessary materials for folding, for use of Members of the House and for use of the Clerk's office and the House folding room (not including envelopes, writing paper, and other paper and materials to be printed and furnished by the Public Printer upon requisitions from the Clerk of the House, under the provisions of the act approved January 12, 1895, for the public printing and binding), $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Spanish Treaty Claims Commission," on page 71, after line 3, to insert:

For expenses incurred in connection with the taking of testimony in Cuba in claims now pending before the Commission, $5,000; and said Commission is authorized to employ in Cuba one interpreter and translator at a compensation of $200 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Judgments in Indian depredation claims," on page 73, line 6, after the word "Senate," to strike out "Document" and insert "Documents;" in line 7, after the word "Eleven," to insert "and One hundred and thirty;" and in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "forty-one thousand one hundred and twelve" and insert "sixty-five thousand four hundred and forty-six;" so as to read:

For payment of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in Indian depredation cases certified to Congress at its present session in Senate Documents Nos. 11 and 130, $65,446, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. HALE. Going back to page 31, in line 12 I move to strike out the word "three" and insert "six."

The SECRETARY. In line 12, page 31, it is proposed to strike out the word "three," before the word "hundred," and insert the word "six;" so as to read:

Sherman statue: * * * and for preparing, at a cost not exceeding $600, an illustrated description of said statue.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. That is all, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois rose to an amendment. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. The amendment has been withdrawn.

Mr. HOPKINS. After a conference with the Senator in charge of the bill I will not present the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments?

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any wish to reserve any one of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole? [A pause.] Shall the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole be agreed to in the Senate?

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I beg to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Texas is not in his seat. He stated that he desired to have something to say upon one amendment which he wanted to have stricken out.

Mr. COCKRELL. He knew the bill was under consideration.

Mr. BATE. I merely call attention to it. It is nothing to me. I observed that the Senator from Texas was not in his seat, and I called attention to it as a usual courtesy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not the duty of the Chair to have Senators present when a bill is under consideration.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, what is the question?

Mr. HALE. I sent for the Senator from Texas some time ago.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us vote.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asked whether or not it was the wish of any Senator to reserve any one of the amendments reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to reserve the point of order, or to make it now, if necessary, against the amendment of the committee, beginning in line 1, page 10, providing for a loan of $4,000,000 to the Louisiana Exposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the other amendments reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole? The Chair hears no objection, and they are regarded as agreed to.

The Senator from Texas makes a point of order on one amendment. Will the Senator please state his point of order?

Mr. BAILEY. It is that there is no existing law authorizing further aid to this exposition, either by the way of a loan or direct gift. I take it that the Chair does not deem it necessary to have the point of order argued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas does not distinctly state the point of order. Is it that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill?

Mr. BAILEY. It is what would properly be called special legislation, and that is the very objection I have to it. If it were a proposition to loan money to every man in the country who had undertaken an enterprise and found himself without sufficient funds to carry it through, it would be a general law; but it is a special law, because it provides a special loan to this special institution. But the rule, I observe, uses the words "general legislation," and to conform the point of order to the rule I submit that this is general legislation and therefore not in order under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Texas now desire further to enforce his point of order by argument?

Mr. BAILEY. I think I could not enforce it by an argument, and I am not disposed to occupy the time of the Senate needlessly. I take it that the Chair is as ready to rule on the point of order now as he would be after the most elaborate discussion.

I should like to defeat this proposition if I can. I should like to see it go out on the point of order; but I have never seen anything go out on a point of order that a majority of the Senate desired to keep in. Still, however, out of a kind of customary deference to the rule I make the point of order in the hope, but not in the expectation, that it will go out.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I fully sympathize with the Senator from Texas. I do not desire to occupy much time of the Senate.

The situation is anomalous. It has never existed before. The answer to the Senator, in short, must be that the Government has already embarked in this enterprise; that it has committed itself to it by appropriations; that it is a continuing enterprise, and that all that is done now is the advance of certain moneys, to be repaid in a specific way.

The charter of the Exposition Company is a very broad one. Anticipating a point of order, I have been looking it over. Section 1 of the act of March 3, 1901, declared by the United States that there should be this exhibit. It does not leave it to somebody else, but declares that there shall be this exhibit. Section 3 provides a United States commission, to be appointed by the President, to exercise certain jurisdiction over this enterprise and all through its operation. That is another part of this great charter. Section 5 provides that the commission shall accept the site selected for the exposition, and that is another very important feature of this large charter, as I call it.

Section 8 provides not that anybody else shall fix the dedication, but that the Government shall, and when the dedication shall be; and that is another step. Section 9 provides that proclamation shall be made to the world, not by any officer of any company or any association, but by the Government of the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to interrupt him with a question just at this point?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. It has been some time since I have read this particular act, but all preceding similar acts contained an express stipulation that the passage of the act should not commit the Government in any way to further appropriation.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BAILEY. I wonder if that is in this act.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly; and if the Government did not go further and commit itself by further appropriations, this company and this exposition could not claim anything more. But while the Government is not committed, it may, as I contend, go further, as it is proposed to do here.

Section 14 provides for the Government participating in the exposition by an immense exhibit upon which it has spent something more than $6,000,000. Section 19 gives outright upon certain conditions to this great enterprise $5,000,000 of our money. That has been paid in. We have that interest in it. Section 20 provides that when it is all ended and the business is wound up the United States shall be a shareholder or stockholder and have a third of all the proceeds that are left.

Now, I could not, if I amplified all the morning, state more clearly the reasons why the Committee on Appropriations believed that this further amount, hemmed and guarded as it is in every respect, was justifiable under the law and under the rules applicable to appropriations in the United States Senate.

The Committee on Appropriations is conservative, and it would not have reported the amendment unless it had believed that under all these conditions the appropriation was justifiable—the complete participation by the Government in this whole affair, its interest in it now and every day, and its final interest as a share or stock holder in the property that is left to be divided, of which the United States Government has a part. The committee did not think that under any conditions should the Government come to the rescue—if I may so put it—of this great enterprise and further embark in it.

But I am willing to leave the question of order to the Chair.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the rule declares that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with certain exceptions, and it then, after several recitations, declares:

And no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session.

Of course if this can be justified at all, it must be justified as the Senator from Maine has sought to justify it, upon the ground that it is in pursuance of existing law. It strikes me as a little singular that the Senator from Maine can find authority for this appropriation in an existing law, which existing law specifically declares that the Government shall not be committed to any further appropriation. In other words, the existing law gave these excellent gentlemen $5,000,000 out of the public Treasury for this great exposition, and then committed the Government to certain exhibitions, which the Senator from Maine says will cost about $6,000,000, thus making it plain that the Government in that act provided for an expenditure of $11,000,000 of public money. That was generous enough; and it is small surprise that Congress in its wisdom should have seen fit to incorporate a provision that it should not be committed to any further support. Possibly it is true that if Congress had omitted that declaration——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Texas allow me? If I said $6,000,000 I misstated it. The amount is not nearly so large as that, but it is a large amount.

Mr. BAILEY. I may have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. HALE. No; I think the Senator is right. I think I may have incautiously used too large a figure, thinking of some other appropriation. It is a very large amount, but not six millions.

Mr. BAILEY. I shall have a word to say about the merits of the proposition. I have nothing further to say about the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair submits the point of order to the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I can not add anything in the way of light on the rules. I do want to make one observation on the policy, and to try, if possible, to have some idea get into the minds of Senators as to how long and how far this thing is to go on.

Mr. BAILEY. It will go on forever.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Buffalo Exposition came out in debt, and its representatives appeared here with a pitiful story of disaster, contractors not being paid, etc., and so on; and we gave them $500,000 more, I think. The Charleston Exposition came out in debt. Another pitiful story came up as to the great hardship that would follow if the Government did not come to the rescue and pay the debts, and the Government gave them $250,000 or thereabouts.

Now, there is the five millions that we put into the St. Louis Exposition. That is gone, and we have a request here for a loan. Is this a loan or a gift? If at the end, at the wind up of this business, after the exposition has been held, it is discovered that we are not to recover this money, then are we going to pay some more debts if the Exposition Company comes out bankrupt and unable to pay its premium list and close out the expenses? In other words, how far are we going to travel down this bad road?

I have had a little slice for my State, and you all remember that I stood here and contended that if we were going to steal, if Congress was going to indulge in that kind of thing, I wanted my share.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator does not mean a steal?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, in one sense. It is unlawful, and everybody knows it is unlawful, and it is unconstitutional. It is constitutional to say that on account of the general welfare we are going to present $5,000,000. That is a very liberal and broad view we have taken. But nobody can undertake to say that to pay the debts of an institution which has gone into an enterprise on its own hook is constitutional and lawful, and therefore it is an indirect steal.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Before I get away from that, and before the Senator interrupts me, I want to say a word in regard to that idea of its being a steal and my having had my share of a steal. I justify that on the ground that we pay taxes, and we contribute our pro rata share to the Treasury, and we get very little back, and if I can get any back I naturally reach out my hands for it.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think they pay more taxes than they ought to?

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly, because we do not get back the same proportion of taxes that we pay in. In other words, we contribute a very much larger sum to the Treasury than is ever spent by the Government in our midst. Therefore we are contributing to the wealth of a people away from home who enjoy the benefits which arise from the Government spending elsewhere the taxes which we pay.

Mr. SPOONER. When the Senator speaks of "home," that means the whole country.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, in a sense. I am an American.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. But I am a South Carolinian, too.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but does the Senator want to occupy the position of recouping for unjust taxation by theft?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, the Senator is quibbling.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not quibbling.

Mr. TILLMAN. He wants to try to play on my words. I simply say that in my judgment the action of Congress in contributing or spending out of the public revenues money in this way is contrary to the laws and to the Constitution and to the rules, and Senators salve their consciences on the legality of this matter by saying, "Well, we have got to vote it: we have to let the money go;" and all that kind of thing. If the Senator will allow me, here is a proposition to lend this money to this concern. Why not lend it to a cotton mill; or, as my friend the Senator from Texas just now illustrated it in private conversation, if it is permissible to lend money to have certain things exhibited—cattle, for instance—why is it not permissible to lend to the farmer who grows the cattle? The two principles run on all fours. It is another subtreasury business in one sense of the word, as far as principle goes.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. I intended no play upon words at all. To tell the truth, I intervened rather to appeal to the Senator to protect himself against himself. I do not think he says what he means when he says that these appropriations, which began long ago and which have continued from time to time, and which have a pretty substantial basis in some respects, are steals, and that the State——

Mr. TILLMAN. Stop; let us differentiate right here. I acknowledge that the power to spend money for the public welfare would legalize a contribution from the Treasury for a specific purpose under it, and there stop.

Mr. SPOONER. Why does the Senator call it a steal and put himself in the attitude of being a participant in it?

Mr. TILLMAN. We lost our money. Our concern did not get any help. It broke. Buffalo did get help, and it broke. They came here with their hats and said, "Gentlemen, we are bankrupt; we have not money enough to pay up. We want you to contribute out of the Treasury." Was that for the public welfare?

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senators would let me pass this little bill, and then they can continue the discussion.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Maine will get his bill passed in ample time. There is no necessity for being double-quick about it. It is only half past 1 o'clock; and if my friend from Wisconsin wants to protect me from myself, I wish to know wherein I have laid myself liable. I think my code of honesty is just as clean as his.

Mr. SPOONER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, then, where have I erred and what have I done which would warrant the Senator in getting up and undertaking to say that I have made admissions which convict me of being more dishonest than he is?

Mr. SPOONER. I will tell you. The Senator's code of honesty in his mind and in his heart is as high as that of anybody.

Mr. TILLMAN. Thanks for so much.

Mr. SPOONER. Thank me pro tanto; but the Senator's speech was not so high as his heart or his mind or his standard of honor, in my judgment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator please show how?

Mr. SPOONER. It is not a steal to begin with, as the Senator has admitted; but he calls it a steal, and puts himself on record as participating in a steal, and I mildly, and in a friendly spirit——

Mr. TILLMAN. In the first place, the Senator possibly carried my words further than I myself intended or meant.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator sometimes——

Mr. TILLMAN. I can not help the Senator's interpretation of my words, you know. It is, I believe, usually allowed a man to explain what he meant.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the word "steal"——

Mr. TILLMAN. What I meant is that from my point of view when the Congress of the United States levies taxes and takes the money from the people and spends it in this way it is a steal. That is my interpretation of a steal. And I say Buffalo got part of a steal and Charleston got part of a steal and St. Louis got a gift, and now comes here for a steal, if we do not get this money back, and nobody expects to get it back. That is what I say. That is what I meant and what I intended to say, and I want to ask Senators how much farther are we going down this road? How far are we going to participate in these——

Mr. SPOONER. Steals.

Mr. TILLMAN. Steals. Yes, I stick to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The Chair has submitted to the Senate the point of order raised by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to say only a word. I am not willing myself to appear to acquiesce in some things that have been said here. It is not entirely competent for me now to say whether, if we were at the beginning of this road which has been pursued for some time, I would favor appropriations out of the public Treasury for these expositions. At the same time it has been going on for a number of years, and all sections have given their approval in the fact that they have sought and obtained some of the benefits thereunder. And however improper, and, if you please, from some standpoints, outside of the strict letter of the law, these actions by Congress may have been, I am not willing to appear to acquiesce in the designation of these appropriations as having been in any manner tainted with dishonesty.

It is for that purpose that I rise to make this brief statement to the Senate, and if expressions of this kind had not been made it is probable I should not have trespassed upon the time of the Senate. As I am on the floor, I will add that in view of the long continued approval by Congress of appropriations of this kind, I should say that this particular proposition is not the one furnishing the point at which we should call a halt. If there is any one of the expositions which should command the approval of the people of the United States generally, it is one which is not only seeking to make an exhibition at this time of the great progress which our country has made, but which is sought to be used as a means of celebrating and emphasizing the wonderful achievement in the acquisition of territory which has done more than any other one act to put us at the present point of prosperity and development and has made it possible that we shall be in the future, if not already so, the greatest nation of the world.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. BACON. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator does not understand my little side remark here as indicating that I am going to vote against this thing.

Mr. BACON. I am sure I have not considered that question one way or the other.

Mr. TILLMAN. But as the Senator appears to be lamenting a difference of opinion and desires to put himself right as to the policy and wisdom and all that kind of thing, I want him not to put me down on a particular line. I merely wanted to know if we were ever going to stop this thing. As I said, Buffalo got hers, Charleston got hers, and St. Louis, of course, shall have hers, so far as my vote goes; but are we to continue perpetually and indefinitely along this policy?

Mr. BACON. Possibly, then, the vote which is to be taken today is not to decide the question which the Senator puts to the Senate, but as I am going to vote for it I am unwilling that the remarks made by the Senator facetiously shall appear to go to the country as an honest expression of an opinion that the contemplated appropriation is a dishonest one.

I wish to say for myself that I do not regard these appropriations as in any way tainted with dishonesty, nor do I regard this particular appropriation as the one at which that point should be made.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator from Georgia think that this is a proper application of the public money?

Mr. BACON. Abstractly considered, I should say to the Senator, undoubtedly, no, I do not, and for that reason I said that if we stood at the beginning of this departure I am not prepared to say but that I would disagree with the proposition and refuse to give it my assistance in any way.

I wish to say simply that the whole country having acquiesced in this practice and the entire country having received the benefit of it, it having to a certain extent the sanction of the public in general, while that, of course, can not settle the constitutional question, this is not the particular place and time at which I am willing that it should be brought up as a reason why this great enterprise should now be jeopardized. While I do not like the policy, and at the beginning of it think I should have opposed it, I shall to-day give my assent to it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to say a single word upon the point of order. I can not very well do so without mentioning also the facts and circumstances which have led up to this appropriation.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has stated succinctly and clearly the original plan or purpose of the exposition, showing that the United States committed itself absolutely to the exposition in commemoration of the great achievement of Thomas Jefferson and those associated with him.

The exposition was organized in the way indicated by the Senator from Maine. The President of the United States was directed to do certain things in connection with it. One of those was to invite foreign governments to participate. That invitation was not extended by a private corporation, but it was extended by the Government, and so far as foreign nations are concerned, they only know practically the Government of the United States in this affair. The foreign governments have already expended or expect to expend, at the invitation of the Government, over $7,000,000 for purposes of the exposition on the site selected by the Government.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Iowa will permit an inquiry, I shall be glad to interrupt him there.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, as a matter of fact, the Government of the United States is holding this exposition?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, we will not enter into all the details. As a matter of fact, the Government of the United States is participating in the exposition. Foreign governments have been invited here. They have expended and they are expending large sums of money.

In the original plan or purpose we required the company to invest $10,000,000, and we agreed, upon that condition, to invest five millions more.

Mr. SPOONER. How is that investment represented?

Mr. ALLISON. Our investment is represented by the statute, which provides that $15,000,000 in the way of profits shall be divided between the United States and those who have contributed the $10,000,000 in proportion to the amount contributed. Therefore, in a sense, we are a partner in the exposition. We are a partner in the sense that we are to participate in the profits of it.

Now, in that view it is found that in order to open the exposition an additional sum of money is required. We certainly are under an obligation to assist in making the necessary preparations for the opening of the exhibition. That is due to the foreign governments as well as to the States of this Union who have also expended large sums of money in this matter. Therefore it is that here is a work in which we have participated and in which we are bound to participate and follow until the end.

So it seems to me that it would be in order to make a direct appropriation, an additional appropriation, if we had chosen so to do; but instead of that we propose in this amendment to advance the money to the exposition in which we have one-third interest, and we require that the money now advanced shall be presently refunded to us.

Mr. SPOONER. How was it represented—by statute?

Mr. ALLISON. It was represented by statutory provision in advance that when the company had expended $10,000,000 we would spend $5,000,000, and that when the exposition is ended whatever profits there are shall be divided between the Government and the Exposition Company.

Mr. SPOONER. On the basis of five million to fifteen million?

Mr. ALLISON. On the basis of five to fifteen million. Therefore our interest, it seems to me, is plain, and our obligation is also plain, because we can not afford in the presence of foreign nations to allow the exposition to fail at this time for want of money to put it into a condition to be opened on the 1st of May. Now, that is all there is about this matter.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. What security have we for the first $5,000,000?

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I have yielded to the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia did not address the Chair, and therefore he is not recognized. The Senator from Tennessee has addressed the Chair.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BATE. I have no question to ask, but simply wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa a question.

Mr. BATE. I desire to say that the point raised by the Senator from Texas meets with my approbation. I think the amendment is amenable to the objection that it is general legislation, and I think we ought to observe the rule. I do not approve of all of the general legislation that has been had touching this and other expositions. I look at this one with great pride.

At the same time, Mr. President, I do not think the Government should become a partner in the loan of money to carry it on. I oppose that. I do not know what right we have to give this money, or to loan it, either, for such a purpose. I do not want to lend my vote to doing it, unless there is some more satisfactory reason given than any I have yet heard.

I wish, Mr. President, to say further——

Mr. ALLISON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BATE. The Senator will please excuse me. I thought he was through. I do not——

Mr. ALLISON. I have yielded to the Senator.

Mr. BATE. I do not know how others will vote on this proposition, but I want to place myself right on the record in regard to it.

I wish to make a further remark in regard to the moneys appropriated by the Government for these expositions. I think the Government had better give than loan the money, for it seems that the Government has had most of that it became responsible for to pay in the end. I do not like this partnership between the Government and individuals and corporations. Besides, it is not clear that we have the right under the Constitution to use Government money for such purposes. Let the right be what it may, this partnership policy is bad business.

We held a very large exposition at Nashville in 1897, lasting for months, and I believe it came out without the Government having a dollar to pay. It was managed most beautifully and successfully. Its income was large and it was self-sustaining. I am glad to make that statement for my State and for the exposition that was held at Nashville, our capital. I know that in the case of a large exposition like the one at St. Louis much has to be done and much has already been done. I want to see everything done in a liberal way, but I do not approve the course of doing it. I am proud of the cause that brought it abont, of the history of that part of our country it represents, and hope it will be, as it ought to be, a wonderful success. But, Mr. President, I think the point of order made by the Senator from Texas is well taken.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. What I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa is this: We are going to give this additional four million and a half to the fair, and there is an apparent provision made that it will be refunded. It seems to me that we had better do it with our eyes open. Does the Senator from Iowa really believe, as a business proposition, that we are going to get back one dollar of the loan or that we are not much more likely to be called on to pay up more debts of a bankrupt affair, as we have done two or three times? That is a matter of opinion, I am aware.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a matter of opinion.

Mr. LODGE. But I think we ought to know what we are doing.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not suppose my opinion is of any great value, but I should hate to impair the efficiency of the exhibition in advance. Of course its success depends upon the people of the United States who choose to visit it. The Exposition Company have no other debts; this is the only debt they have; and I would venture the opinion that if it is well managed they will be able to refund this sum to the United States. The company will also be able to pay the expenses of the exposition if they have no other debts, and I think they will not create any other.

Mr. LODGE. I am very glad that is the opinion of the Senator from Iowa, because what I anticipate myself is that we shall be asked presently for a repeal of this law, which provides for the receipts being turned in to the Government. I hope I am not unduly pessimistic in expecting that result.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senator——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me just to reenforce the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts? We may expect what is to come by what has come. The very concluding section of the act originally passed specifically pledged this company or committed the Government against any further appropriation. It says:

That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, nor for any claim for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support or liquidation of any debts or obligations created by said commission.

Now, that act was approved on the 3d of March, 1901. In less than three years they are coming back here, and so distinguished a Senator as the Senator from Iowa is arguing that, notwithstanding that provision, we are in partnership with them and we must pay more.

Mr. ALLISON. I have endeavored to state the character of our relations to the exposition. That, of course, is a law which we passed three years ago, but I undertake to say that this Congress can, if it chooses, amend that law in order to promote the purpose of the exposition. Therefore I shall vote that this amendment is in order.

Mr. ELKINS. Does the Senator have in mind what our experience was in Chicago and how much the United States lost by that venture?

Mr. ALLISON. We did not lose the $5,000,000 which we have contributed already to this exposition.

Mr. LODGE. That contribution is lost, I take it.

Mr. ALLISON. It is lost unless there is some profit. The Government is to receive its share of the profits.

Mr. ELKINS. I was diverted at the moment, and I did not hear the Senator's explanation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend for a moment. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 82, by Mr. BACON, favoring the negotiation by the President of a treaty with the Republic of Colombia to satisfactorily adjust and determine all differences between the United States and Colombia growing out of the recent revolution in Panama, etc.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside that we may finish this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. ELKINS. As I remember, when this proposition came before the Senate originally there was a sort of understanding that the Government of the United States would not be asked again to contribute.

Mr. ALLISON. We have that understanding every time we propose to aid an exposition, that it is the last one we will aid.

Mr. ELKINS. Why did not the Committee on Appropriations, charged with the interest of the Government in respect to guarding the public funds, see to it that when an exposition wants money out of the Treasury its agents should keep their promises? The Senate can do that; it can oblige people to keep their promises. We have it in our hands right now to compel this exposition to keep its promises.

Let me say to the Committee on Appropriations, you are confronting a deficiency of $43,000,000, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, if we take care of everything that we can reasonably expect and exercise all the economy we can. Where is this money to come from? Where is this $4,600,000 to come from. I want to ask the Senator? How is he going to provide for it? You will be cutting down the rivers and harbors appropriations, or refuse a bill; you will be cutting down everything we come to you and ask for.

This is in a large sense a local issue. This is for the Mississippi Valley, if you please. There is too much sentiment about this matter. Let us treat this like business men. Will the bankers of St. Louis and the president of this Exposition Company write across the face of this loan in advance that they will pay it back with 4 per cent interest, or without interest in case the gate receipts do not do it? Let us advance it on those conditions.

Let the people of Missouri, let St. Louis that is to be benefited more than any other part of the country, indorse this loan through her great trust companies and her great banks.

If the Senator from Iowa is going to do a piece of private business, I do not mean to say now that he would exercise more care about that than he does about the affairs of the Government, not near as much; but I venture to say that he would say, "I am used to security for loans I make; I do not take promises." We have taken one promise here, and the Senator says it is very doubtful whether we will ever get back the $5,000,000 the United States has already advanced.

Mr. ALLISON. What Senator said that?

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator himself said that it was doubtful whether we get back the first $5,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. We are giving this as a lien on that now.

Mr. ALLISON. We are giving a lien.

Mr. ELKINS. It is doubtful, in your mind, if we ever get a dollar back of the $5,000,000 already advanced.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not expressing such an opinion.

Mr. ELKINS. We are standing here as servants of the people, as their trustees, and why should we give away $4,600,000 when you do not know where the money is to come from, when you have got to stint the Government in other directions in its ordinary operations? I ask the Senator if everything I say on this point is not true?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, if this money is paid, it will be paid from the Treasury of the United States. The security may not be ample, but we do not always have the best security. If we could have the indorsement of my friend from West Virginia, I should feel very much safer.

Mr. ELKINS. If my constituents, the people of West Virginia, should get up an exposition and the Government had contributed $5,000,000 to this end, I would gladly, with other citizens of my State, indorse any further loan the Government or banks might make to carry on the exposition.

Mr. ALLISON. But I have no doubt myself, at least I feel a reasonable assurance, that our security for this loan, which is a loan or advance, will be found to be good, and that we will realize the amount we now advance.

I did not intend to say so much on this subject, Mr. President, and least of all do I intend now to enter into an elaborate discussion of the resources of our Government and the question as to how much of those resources shall be annually applied to the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I desire to say only one word in answer to my friend from West Virginia. It is evident from his question to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that he has not read the terms of this security. If he had done so as the head of one of the financial or banking corporations which he so ably manages and represents, he would say that this is ample security. It provides that 40 per cent of the gross receipts from all sources received by the St. Louis Exposition shall be returned to the Government under such directions and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may make and provide therefor. Therefore it only requires about $11,000,000 gross receipts from this exposition, in which every State and every county of every State and every American citizen feels a national pride. So from a business standpoint the exposition must be a failure in every respect or this Government will be reimbursed every dollar that she advances under the terms of the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from California a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. If this is perfectly good security, why can they not borrow it in open market of private lenders?

Mr. PERKINS. Because money in the open market is not plentiful at this time. I know in the great money centers like Boston our Yankee friends, known for their prudence as well as their enterprise, because I came from one of those States myself, prefer Government bonds rather than any other security for loans which they may advance; but I will say, in answer to my friend from Massachusetts, that the Government exacts no interest, and that is the only advantage. The Government is willing to let them have this money without interest.

Mr. ELKINS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. Why is the Committee on Appropriations so willing to give up Government money without security?

Mr. PERKINS. We have security.

Mr. ELKINS. Allow me to ask the Senator one question. You say the Government will get 40 per cent of the gate receipts?

Mr. PERKINS. Forty per cent of the gross receipts.

Mr. ELKINS. You allow 60 per cent for operating?

Mr. PERKINS. Sixty per cent for operating.

Mr. ELKINS. I want to say to the Senator that in the administration of my own affairs, limited as they are, I would want better security than it is proposed to take for the Government. There is not a Senator here advocating this proposition who would not demand better security in his own private affairs.

Mr. PERKINS. The citizens of St. Louis and of this Government have made a permanent investment here of over $20,000,000. They throw it open to the public and the public pay for admission to the exposition and pay also for the privilege of making an exhibition in the various buildings erected there.

Mr. McCOMAS. Will the Senator from California allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from California yield?

Mr. PERKINS. To both my friends, first to my friend from Maryland and then I will yield to my friend from West Virginia.

Mr. McCOMAS. I desire to ask a question, but I wish first to say that this relevant and luminous discussion of the point of order has quite convinced me that I shall vote with the majority.

Mr. TILLMAN. How does the Senator know which is the majority?

Mr. McCOMAS. I know the majority will be against the point of order and for the exposition loan.

I ask the Senator from California, as 40 per cent of the gate receipts are the security for the advance, whether he recalls what was the total amount of gate receipts at Chicago?

Mr. PERKINS. We have the data at hand.

Mr. McCOMAS. About how much?

Mr. PERKINS. It is not in my memory at this time. Mr. President, there is no use to go into details upon this matter.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. Now, suppose there was a great epidemic, and suppose the gate receipts did not amount to $2,000,000 or $20,000,000, where would be the security of the United States?

Mr. PERKINS. Where would be the great city of St. Louis?

Mr. ELKINS. It would be on the banks of the Mississippi.

Mr. PERKINS. Where would be my friend from West Virginia?

Mr. ELKINS. The city and the Mississippi Valley would be the beneficiary. The Government would be furnishing the money with a chance of losing it. Now, what security, let me ask the Senator, does the Government have? Suppose there would be $11,000,000 of gate receipts?

Mr. PERKINS. Because our estimate is four times that sum.

Mr. ELKINS. Whose estimate?

Mr. PERKINS. The estimate of the managers of the exposition.

Mr. ELKINS. The Appropriations Committee does not belong to the managers of the exposition.

Mr. PERKINS. But the managers have given us the benefit of their experienceand their investigation. The Appropriations Committee have considered this question both from a patriotic standpoint and from a national standpoint, as the chairman of the committee has so ably presented to the Senate. He has shown that the honor of the nation is committed to making the exposition a success: and what we undertake we never fail in.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me state to the Senator that the first five million has been expended. Where and how?

Mr. LODGE. That is gone.

Mr. PERKINS. That was well invested; much better than some of the money we have given to improve the rivers in West Virginia, for the floods have washed away the levees and dams we appropriated money to build.

Mr. ELKINS. Ah, that belongs to the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. So does this great exposition belong to the United States.

Mr. ELKINS. No; the exposition does not belong to the United States. It is, as I said, in a sense a local matter, and directly benefits the people who inhabit the great Mississippi Valley.

Mr. TILLMAN. We can not hear what the Senator from West Virginia is saying, and we are very much interested.

Mr. ELKINS. The object is said to be to carry the exposition to a successful conclusion. Now, what I want is security. I do not want to give the Government's money away without security.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will not carry his business habits into the discussion.

Mr. ELKINS. I wish to say that it would be better to have perhaps more businesslike habits in the Senate, especially when it comes to giving up the nation's money. Why could not the Appropriations Committee have gotten from the managers of the exposition some security other than the gate receipts?

Mr. KEAN. The gate receipts are cash.

Mr. ELKINS. The great trust companies of St. Louis are bursting with money, and there are the great banks of the city. The banks of Chicago came to the relief of the Chicago Exposition, headed by Lyman J. Gage, and they took a great deal of the burden on their own shoulders. The bankers of St. Louis, as I understand it, have not agreed to give any of this money.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to answer my friend from West Virginia, but his questions are too sweeping; there is too much sea room. I wish to say to him that our great Government sometimes has had a claim against some of the Central American states and they have not had the means, as St. Louis has not the means to-day, to make an advance to this Government and to pay the claim that had been adjudicated by our commissioners or by the Department of State. So they said to this Government, "We will give you a certain per cent of our revenue that comes through the collections at the custom-houses of our country." The Government took that as security. My friend from West Virginia would say, "Suppose they did not import anything in their country; suppose they had no duties paid; suppose they had nothing, where is the claim of the United States?"

But, Mr. President, above it all this Government is in honor bound and committed to this proposition. I believe I would vote for this appropriation if I knew that we would never receive a cent in return, and I would think in doing so, not, as my friend from South Carolina does, that I was doing a wrong act, but that I was doing a patriotic act to show to the countries of the world the great resources of this nation as presented by the great Louisiana Exposition.

The great Louisiana purchase, in celebration of which this exposition is to be held, has done more to redound to the financial interest and the honor of this great nation than any other administrative act I can call to mind at this time. But we will have every dollar returned that we now advance to the exposition, and the payments will come right along. In June next the first payment will be made into the Treasury of the United States. We know how efficient that Department is, and certain rules and regulations will be made by which I believe it will successfully bring back to us every dollar we now advance.

I see my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is waiting to ask me a question, and, as I am on the witness stand, I shall be glad to answer him as best I may.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was not rising to interrupt my distinguished friend from California. I merely wanted to ask if an amendment is still in order. Then I wanted to know if this point of order is not sustained—and I know it will not be, at least I think it will not be—whether then the bill can be amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to offer at the proper time a proviso that, after my friend from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] gets through with his Lewis and Clark appropriation, and if anybody, anywhere, has got another exposition hatching, he also be allowed to come in and claim a part of this donation, and then that we may at some time get a pledge among ourselves that we will stop. Everybody says it is wrong.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to some facts of record in regard to the character of the security which the Government will hold as a lien upon all the receipts of the St. Louis Exposition from all sources.

In the Chicago Exposition the total admissions at 50 cents—and I hope the Senators from Massachusetts and West Virginia, as they have been so critical in saying that this is no security, will give attention to the recorded facts, and then they can judge——

Mr. ELKINS. Let me correct the Senator from Missouri. I said it was not sufficient security.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then, as to the sufficiency of the security. The admissions at the Chicago Exposition—and this is the record—during the entire time, chargeable at 50 cents for each person, amounted to 21,478,000. That exposition was held six months. The St. Louis Exposition will be held seven months. In the first three months of the Chicago Exposition the admissions were only 6,514,000, while in the last three months of the exposition the admissions at 50 cents were 14,964,000. The aggregate receipts per month at 50 cents upon the admissions at Chicago were over $10,000,000—nearly $11,000,000. This relates only to admissions, remember, and not to revenues from the concessions and privileges granted, which would aggregate an equal amount. If, at the St. Louis Exposition, continuing seven months, the admissions are no greater than they were at Chicago, the receipts from admissions at the gates will be twice as much.

The Secretary of the Treasury will have in his hands the right to take charge of not only the admissions but the revenues from the concessions. He has the right to place an officer there to supervise the expenditure of this $4,600,000, and at a given time he will begin to pay back 40 per cent of those revenues. Everyone thought that was abundantly sufficient to pay off the debt before the exposition closed.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. How much did the Government lose by the Chicago Exposition, in view of the financial showing made by the distinguished Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not remember exactly. I have not the figures. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] can probably tell.

Mr. ELKINS. They are very satisfactory figures now, but the Government of the United States was a loser in that scheme, and, according to the Senator's figures, the Government ought to have been reimbursed every dollar it expended.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have gone over this matter carefully; we have discussed it with Governor Francis, the president of the Commission; we have taken the admission fees that have been received at other expositions; we have taken the revenues from the concessions, and I want to say, after hearing all this, the distinguished Senators from Maine, Iowa, and New Hampshire, who are on the subcommittee, considered 40 per cent to be ample security; but in order to guard against all possibilities we give the United States a lien upon all the receipts, and whenever the Secretary of the Treasury, supervising the expenditure and supervising the receipts, thinks that a default will be made in any payment he has the right to take charge and receive the receipts both from concessions and from gate fees, and the Secretary of the Treasury will do so. The understanding with him is that he will do so. He has sanctioned and approved this measure, and I believe every dollar of this loan will be returned.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. ELKINS. How can the Secretary of the Treasury enter into this kind of a transaction? How can he watch the gate receipts and decide arbitrarily these questions? The law does not confer such a power upon him.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are sworn officers of the Treasury Department there supervising and approving the expenditure of every dollar of the $15,000,000 that has been spent; and so it will be with this appropriation. The Secretary of the Treasury will be supervising it; he will be receiving the reports of the daily receipts and revenues.

Mr. ELKINS. Could the Secretary of the Treasury substitute his own officers, the officers of the Government, and put them in charge of this exposition?

Mr. COCKRELL. He could do it beyond question.

Mr. ELKINS. Where is the law for that?

Mr. COCKRELL. Right in the pending amendment. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who largely modified this amendment, put in it everything that he thought was a necessary guard for the protection of the Government.

I want it distinctly understood that I do not believe this is a gift. I believe that it is a legitimate loan by the United States as a shareholder in this enterprise and as an exhibitor at this enterprise. We have invited all the nations of the earth to come here and participate in this exposition. They have accepted the invitation and are spending seven or eight millions of their own money in buildings there. Nearly every State in the Union, I believe, with two exceptions, has already taken part in it, and is constructing buildings there, and the Government has encouraged it. This encouragement has been given by all the Departments of the Government.

The Government has put up there one of the handsomest buildings on the grounds, and that building is to-day completed, with the exception merely of its ornamentation. The Missouri State building, costing nearly $1,000,000, is completed, and nearly all the great buildings are completed or are under contract and will be completed in time for the opening. It will be a complete exposition on the 30th day of April next. All the railroads of the country have agreed to make reduced rates, and it will not be astonishing to me, if our present prosperous condition continues and the railroads continue their policy, if this exposition shall prove to be a profitable investment.

I do not consider that it is beyond reason that it should be so. The liabilities will be the $15,000,000 already expended and this sum. When this sum is returned, then the United States will have an interest in the St. Louis Exhibition of $5,000,000; the city of St. Louis an interest of $5,000,000, and the citizens of St. Louis, who have subscribed toward it, $5,000,000. Each one will receive one-third of whatever profit there may be from the exposition. Some expositions in this country have proved successful. The exposition at Omaha proved to be successful, as did the one at Nashville.

On this exposition forty-odd million dollars will have been expended when the gates are opened on the 30th of April, and it will be such an exposition as has never been seen on this earth—it will be far ahead of anything that has ever heretofore existed. It will be nearly a half larger than the exposition at Chicago, and the buildings are larger in every respect.

Nearly all the States are erecting buildings there; the foreign governments are erecting buildings there, and the exhibits are now being put in position in many of the buildings.

The buildings will be completed and the opening will be attractive. In my judgment twice as many admission fees will be received in the first three months, if not three times as many, as were received at Chicago, because, unfortunately, the Chicago Exposition, as everybody knows, was not complete on the day of the opening.

I do not consider that this Government runs a particle of risk in this matter. I think that it is in honor bound to see that this enterprise is a success. I think the honor of our country and of our people is involved in it. I believe that the money will be returned, and that the world will behold the grandest exposition ever held, made by the greatest nation of the earth and the most progressive people.

I hope that the point of order will be voted down and that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I refrained from saying anything upon the merits of the proposition when I submitted the point of order, stating, however, that I did desire to have a word to say upon the main question when the point of order should have been disposed of. I believe no Senator except the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has addressed himself to the point of order since the Senator; and if it is the practice here to discuss the merits of a proposition pending a point of order, I may as well avail myself of this opportunity to say what I desire. I will, however, say that the obvious disposition on the part of the supporters of the amendment to discuss the merits of it, instead of the point of order, encourages me to believe that I am undoubtedly right on the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I was about to ask the Senator if he had the slightest doubt on the point of order?

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all; and I do not think any other Senator has much doubt about it.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator suppose for one moment that that point of order is going to be decided on its parliamentary merits?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not.

Mr. LODGE. I know the Senator sees why we are discussing the merits of the proposition.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly; and the point of order is so obviously well taken that has been submitted to the Senate, so that it may decide the point of order according as it would decide on the passage of the amendment itself. Being a new and inexperienced member of this body, I supposed that the rule could be invoked; and I was innocent enough to think that our rules would control our deliberations; but if the practice is otherwise, I shall conform to the practice without a protest.

I believe that no body in the world can transact its business in an orderly manner, except in accordance with rules previously established. It was deemed so important that the Senate should have the power to make the rules according to which it should conduct its business that in the organic law of the Republic that is one of the especially conferred powers on both Houses; a power which they would undoubtedly have possessed if there had been no mention of it.

But, Mr. President, the only defense for incorporating this provision in a general appropriation bill is that there is now on the books a law which, in some indefinite way, commits us to the success of this great exposition. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] does not more heartily hope for the success of this great enterprise than I do.

The difference between us is that I believe the giving of expositions is a private or a corporate enterprise, and not a governmental function, and upon that difference I vote against such appropriations, while he votes for them. But whatever may be the difference between him and me as to the propriety of such an application of the public money, there can be no difference between him and me as to the proposition that this law, as it stands, so far from authorizing a further appropriation under the rules of the Senate, positively, explicitly, and specifically forbids it.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator read the language of it?

Mr. BAILEY. The language is this:

That nothing in this act—

The original act—

shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred—

That was inserted to provide against contingencies that had formerly arisen, in which exhibitors from foreign lands, being underpaid or not paid at all, set up claims upon the equity of the Federal Government for their premiums, and the Federal Government beginning, as I now recall, with the great Cotton Exposition at New Orleans, has paid these unpaid premiums for every exposition. Having covered that in that provision, the act then proceeds—and this is the part of it that covers this case—nor for any claim for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress—

And they did not stop there—or the Treasury of the United States—

Mr. SPOONER. That is the same thing.

Mr. BAILEY. I think so; but the words seem to have been used out of abundant caution, because how the Treasury could aid it without first procuring a law of Congress is, of course, beyond my comprehension, as it is beyond the comprehension of us all.

But, as if to "make"—borrowing the poet's phrase—"assurance double sure," they said that this act should not be construed to commit the Government to any aid either through Congress or through the public Treasury.

The mental process by which a Senator can find in a law which expressly declares against the idea that we are committed to aid a proposition an obligation to continue our aid to it I shall not undertake to follow. There is, of course, some reason for it, or else the Senator from Iowa, whose great ability I profoundly respect, would not make that kind of an argument. I only call attention to it to confess my inability to understand it.

Now, Mr. President, passing from the point of order as very material, but as not to be considered by the Senate, I want to say a word about this practice. It is not an old one. If it had continued through a century I would say that it was now too late to question the policy of applying public moneys to such a purpose; but the Senator from Iowa was a Member of Congress before the first of these appropriations was made. The first one, made to aid the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia, was, like this, made in the form of a loan, which the Government only recovered at the end of a lawsuit.

This morning, as I came to the Senate Chamber to perform my duties, I met a gentleman, still comparatively a young man, who then had the honor to serve the great State of Pennsylvania as one of its Members in the other House, and although that bill was giving aid to an exposition to be held in his own State and to celebrate, not one of the most important, but the most important, achievement of the human race, he did not see his way clear to support it; and to his honor, be it said, he chose to go out of Congress rather than to support that proposition. The most splendid speech made against the appropriation, not even excepting the great speech of Mr. Thurman in this body, was made by Alexander G. Cochrane, then a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

That first proposition, even under the great enthusiasm of that time, was carried by a bare majority. Gradually we have gone on, first one locality and then another, committing to the support of such projects men whose judgment did not approve them, even coercing my distinguished friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the point of voting for all of them because others had voted for one of his. He is not entirely satisfied with his position, and he propounds the very proper query, "Where will it stop?" I tell him there is no stopping place. There are events enough in the history of this Republic to make an exposition for almost every community in the land. Like the brook, these demands for Federal assistance will go on forever, because the repeated appropriations from Congress will finally be accepted as the settled policy of the Government, and then no man will dare to stand and argue against either the wisdom or the propriety of them.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me one minute?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to correct one little phase, not a mistake so much as ignorance, I suppose, on his part. The appropriation for the Charleston Exposition was not to aid it at all. We asked for it. We put it on the same bill with the St. Louis appropriation. The Senate put it in unanimously, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations at the other end of the Capitol took it by the throat and squeezed it to death.

We had our exposition, such as it was, without a dollar of help from the Federal Government. But when Buffalo came forward and claimed that the million dollars which had been given her had not only been lost, but that there was $500,000 additional lost, which was due to contractors and others, and there was a disposition to pay Buffalo's debts, there being a deficit in South Carolina, I asked the Senate to pay the debts of South Carolina's exposition; and all we got was $250,000. We never got a cent for holding the exposition; we only got our debts paid.

Mr. ELKINS. But you got $250,000.

Mr. BAILEY. I was not mistaken about the facts in the case. I perfectly understood them as the Senator from South Carolina has stated them. I only meant to say that even South Carolina and her Senator could be brought to imitate a bad example.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator, however, disclaimed the integrity and honesty of the appropriation. He said it was a steal, and he says so still.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from South Carolina so characterized it.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is my judgment.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly. The Senator from South Carolina is in the habit of expressing his judgment in very plain words. But I am not willing to call it a steal; I choose a milder phrase. I think it is a misapplication of the public money——

Mr. TILLMAN. Misappropriation.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not say that it is unconstitutional. I am myself inclined to accept, and I have always been inclined to accept, the doctrine laid down by Mr. Monroe in his great message vetoing the Cumberland road bill. I am inclined to think that the power of appropriation is unlimited in the Congress, save only that it shall be applied to a general rather than a local purpose; but when you seek to qualify the rule, even as he did by that statement, it becomes impossible to define what is a general and what is a local purpose. That doctrine, as laid down by Mr. Monroe, was afterwards approved by General Jackson in his celebrated message vetoing the Maysville road bill. With the money in the Treasury of the United States I hold that Congress has the right to give it to any purpose that it may deem general rather than local.

I couple with that, however, an insistence upon the other branch of Mr. Monroe's proposition, and that is that it shall be a naked appropriation, unaccompanied by the exercise of any power. Following that, I would prefer—because the money is incomparably less to me than the precedent—to see this money given to the exposition at St. Louis rather than to see Senators standing here wrangling like bank clerks over what is good security.

So far as I am concerned, I believe this money will be paid back; but I would rather give it away than to have the Government become a mere money changer, sending its officers to act as gatekeepers at the doors of an exposition.

The Government's function is to govern and not to engage in private enterprises as a stockholder in private corporations. It may have power to give away the people's money, and in doing so it can do the people no further wrong than to spend their substance, which is a wrong expressed in dollars and cents; but when the Government steps down from its high place as a sovereign to become a mere dealer in securities, a mere lender of money, stationing its agents at the door of expositions to collect their toll, it does something, to say the least, toward forfeiting the great respect in which all the people ought to hold it.

These expositions have been useful—I have no doubt of that—beginning with the great one at Philadelphia down to the latest one at Buffalo, I believe. They have all contributed something toward a better understanding of the marvelous resources of this country by its people. But it is no part of a government's business to do that. A thousand useful benefactions can be imagined, fit subjects for individual and corporate enterprise, but wholly beyond the province of government; and that is why I object to this appropriation.

Of all those that have been held, excepting only the great one which celebrated the independence of our whole country, not one appeals to me with such a force as this—celebrating an event connected not only with the region in which I live, but connected with an immortal name whose memory I cherish. I could not wish otherwise than that an exposition celebrating the Louisiana purchase should be a success. But devoutly as I wish it to succeed, I am not willing to see the Government insure its success any more than I would be willing to see the Government insure the success of any other worthy individual or corporate enterprise.

Tell me, Mr. President, if this Government shall loan its funds for expositions in which the people shall view the products of our marvelous energy, our wonderful intelligence, our incomparable soil, what argument shall you successfully make when the men who produce this wealth, which constitutes the marvel of all the ages, demand of the Government the loan of money to enable them first to produce these goods that are afterwards to be exhibited? There must be production before there can be exhibition. And upon what theory is it that the Government laughs out of the halls of Congress the man who applies for a loan to produce them, and yet welcomes to its committee room the gentlemen who apply for loans to exhibit them?

If the farmers of the wonderful Mississippi Valley should come here with a petition reaching from the Capitol to St. Louis, asking the Government to loan them money to make these crops that are to be exhibited at St. Louis, we would draw our cloaks about us and say, "Here is another senseless subtreasury scheme;" and yet I am not able to distinguish on principle between the loan of money to a man to make his crop and a loan to another man or corporation to exhibit the crop when made.

I never had any patience with the subtreasury scheme, and although at that time it appeared to be invincible in certain States and sections I did not hesitate to declare that never, under any circumstances, would I vote to make a money lender of the Federal Government. When I was first a candidate for Congress I said that to the farmers, who at that time demanded of all candidates in our section that they agree to support the subtreasury plan. My judgment could not indorse that, and yet it was as feasible as this. There was no question as to their security. They would have satisfied even my distinguished friend the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

The Senator from West Virginia would never have demanded better security than those farmers offered, because they offered the grain and the cotton that feed and clothe the world.

But we turned them from the door of Congress with the statement that it was no part of the Federal Government's business to become a money lender. I say so here. I make the same answer to the great St. Louis Exposition that I made to the farmers who advocated the subtreasury. It is the business of government to govern, and not the business of government to engage in corporate enterprise or in the loaning of money.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I believe thoroughly in what is known as the principle of the liberal construction of the Constitution; I believe in it by tradition and habit of mind; and I should probably think a number of things constitutional that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] would not; but I confess it seems to me for the Government to lend money to a corporate enterprise of this kind is going pretty far.

Moreover, I would much rather see the money given outright. I think it would be more straightforward; I think it would be dealing more fairly with the people and with the Treasury to do it. I did not say that no security was offered. I said poor security was offered; and I think it is poor security. If it was good security the men in this country who have money to lend would be very quick to advance it to the Exposition Company. Those gentlemen come here to borrow money because they can not borrow money on that security anywhere else. Now, the security may turn out to be excellent. It is all a matter of speculation.

The business of having expositions, as I took occasion to say, I think, once before in debate, has developed into an industry. The getting up at various points of expositions or world's fairs has become a branch of industry, and with each successive exposition, so far as my observation goes, the profit has declined. The people are sated with them. There have been too many. There are too many planned. I hope the exposition at St. Louis will be the greatest success in the world. It celebrates a very great event. If anything deserves a celebration of that kind it is the purchase of the Louisiana territory. In the same way I think the Lewis and Clark expedition and the taking of the Oregon country constitute a very great event and deserve celebration. But if we go on there is no place where they can not find some reason for an exposition, and the tendency of the industry has been to reduce the local support more and more and come more and more to the Government. By and by the Government will be expected to hold industrial expositions at its own expense at certain points in this country from time to time.

It seems to me that that is not a form of Government expenditure on which it is desirable to embark. We have gone very far already. We have begun by making large appropriations for these expositions as they have arisen. I can see a good reason for the Government making a great exhibit itself and paying for that exhibit and its expenses with such liberality as to make a great contribution. But we have not stopped there. The next step was to go forward and pay the debts of an exposition to which we had already made a contribution.

Now, here is an exposition to which we have made a great contribution of five millions, an out-and-out gift, of which no dollar will ever come back. We are asked now to duplicate that gift, and in my humble opinion we shall be asked to pay some debts on top of it, and I suppose we shall pay them. This I regard as a gift, and I think it would be just as well to say so.

Mr. President, it is going to pass. The point of order upon which the Senate is called on to pass would never be before us if it were not a good one. It is before us by submission. It has been submitted to us by the Chair, and the Senate knows perfectly well that the point of order is well taken; but we are going to vote it down and we are going to vote this additional appropriation.

I voted for the former appropriation for St. Louis. I did so with great cheerfulness. It was stated at the time that that was all; that there would be no more. I confess I did not expect to see a second demand made quite so soon; but it is here, and it is going to pass.

What I desire to call attention to is this, and it is all that has led me to take part in the debate: We know the condition of the revenues and the expenditures of the Government. We know that to say the best there is probably going to be deficits at the end of the year. Just what our financial condition is has been ably presented elsewhere in a very strong speech, and the chairman of the Appropriations Committee elsewhere has put it strongly to the country and to Congress that we ought to guard ourselves in expenditures. His speech made a great impression on my mind, as I have no doubt it did on others. This item of four millions and a half is going back to that House, in the face of that speech, to be accepted, I suppose, in conference and passed by the House, which has listened to that financial statement. Here we are confronted with this condition of the revenues and the expenditures, and we are to be told in the Senate, on every bill that comes up, by the members of the Committee on Appropriations that we need economy, and we do. I agree with them.

We have been told that there must be no river and harbor bill; that we have not the revenue this year to make it wise to enter upon that expenditure. I agree with that proposition. We are told that we must have no public buildings for the same reason, and I think the last general public-building bill was only a million and a half in amount more than we are now going to vote to a fair. I agree that this is not a good time to vote large public-building expenditures. Yet there are public buildings needed—I mean absolutely needed—for the conduct of the Government's work all over this country. We need a new Department building, a building that will house the Department of Justice, the Department of Commerce, and the State Department. We can not have it. The revenues do not justify it. Its initial cost probably would not be much greater than the amount we are going to give to the fair. I agree that this is not the time to do it. We shall be told that we need economy on the army bill when it comes up, on the naval bill when it comes up, on the diplomatic and consular bill, where we have a starved service, and we shall be told that this is not the time to increase expenditures. We shall be told it on the Post-Office bill, and I happen to be a member of the committee having it in charge. We shall meet it on the sundy civil bill. We shall meet in every direction the injunction that this is a year for economy and that the revenues do not justify great expenditures.

Now, it is quite possible that public buildings are built which are not altogether needed. Some Senators may think we do not need more battle ships, but for my part I think we need them more than anything else, if we are to maintain peace and maintain the Monroe doctrine on this hemisphere. And I might go on with other things. But I simply say, as an illustration on these two propositions, that at least if we build the battle ship, or dredge the river, or build the dike, or rear the custom-house or the post-office, we have given to the people, with their money, a permanent piece of property which can be used by all the people of the United States. But in all those directions we must have rigid economy, and I do not quarrel with it. I do not want to see more taxation imposed. I think it is our duty to exercise wise economy and to bring our expenditures as near to our revenues as possible.

But when that argument of economy is made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the other House, when we hear it on all hands, I do say that to ask us to expend now, this month, next month, and the following months, four millions and a half of money out of the Treasury in behalf of a fair—I admit it is a great and splendid exposition, and I wish it all success—is a curious contradiction of the lessons to which we have been listening.

I do not desire to be mean or parsimonious to these expositions. I helped to vote $5,000,000 to the St. Louis Exposition; I expect to vote an appropriation for the Lewis and Clark Exposition; but if this is to be an industry, if it is to be a regular thing, surely there must be a limit somewhere. We have given $5,000,000. We shall probably be asked to pay debts. Now we are asked to duplicate that great gift. I think, Mr. President, it is a very serious expenditure to enter upon, especially when the amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest and with much amazement to what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has just said. Can it be that the affairs of this great Government has been so conducted by the party in power that we have reached the point where, because of lavish expenditures for purposes of war or conquest and for enterprises foreign to everything that the fathers thought should be included in our appropriations, necessary aid should now be withheld from a great exposition, to which not only all the people of this country but all the world have been looking forward as the greatest event of the kind since 1876?

Is it possible that the leaders of the great party in power now confess, without making any attempt to relieve the condition of the Treasury, that every enterprise in the country which looks to the promotion and the increase of commerce and the welfare of our people must be stopped because of the extraordinary expenditures in matters which ought to have been foreign to a free government? Must the Army and the Navy be increased and at such an expense that we can not prepare the great ports of this country so that they will admit the ships drawing 35 feet, that carry freight and passengers all over the world?

Are the ports of Boston, New York, Baltimore, and New Orleans, and other great ports, confessed to-day to be insufficient in depth of water and other facilities to admit the great, mammoth ships which have been built for trade not to be improved because the expenditures for war and conquest have been too great, and therefore must commerce be stayed and enterprise checked?

The Senator states we can not now consider a proposition for a home for the Department of Justice or enter upon other necessary expenditures of the Government because of deficiency in the Treasury. Yet not one move, Mr. President, is to be made by this Congress to remedy the defects in the revenue laws, so as to increase our Treasury receipts. To "stand pat" is the phrase, while all the enterprises within the original domain are to be hampered and checked. A revenue bill is not to be considered because an election approaches, and the party in power fears to go before the country with increased taxation. You know, as we all know, that this prosperity which has been with us for six or eight years is on the wane. Not only has the revenue fallen off, but the action of other governments threatens further decrease in our exports, and yet you talk only of acquisition of territory, and no relief is proposed for the business interests of the country.

I am delighted that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and one in charge of financial bills elsewhere have been brought to confess the inadequacy of the present revenue laws; and it is well for the people of the country to realize that fear of party embarrassment prevents Congress from taking up the question and dealing with the revenue laws, and dealing with them in a spirit and manner not destructive of any interest, but so as to increase the revenue and also to prepare for that great threatening movement which has begun in England, the country to which we send nearly half of our output. If that country carries out the suggestion which has been made, of taxing our cereals, and it probably will, it will take from the Northwest, the great grain-producing section of our country, the ability to profitably compete in the near future.

Mr. President, we had better postpone for a year or two years the expenditure of a hundred and fifty or two hundred and fifty million dollars upon other enterprises, great as they are, than to permit this exposition at St. Louis to fail, or to allow the harbors of the great ports of the United States to remain in their present condition. The river and harbor bill is necessary to the future, and the immediate future prosperity of our commerce. There should be no delay. We must economize, but do not, I beg the Senate, economize upon matters that are so necessary at home.

It may be, now that we have entered upon the control of islands 8,000 miles distant and that our armies are there, that we must maintain the establishment for the time being, but still there comes a suggestion from the Secretary of the Navy, natural and inevitable, and only the beginning, for $8,000,000 more for a naval establishment in the far-distant Pacific and coaling stations upon many islands in all the oceans, and for more war ships, when we have more ships now than can be manned, a Navy greater by fivefold than the fathers ever thought necessary to maintain the Monroe doctrine and protect our interests in every part of the globe.

We shall always maintain the doctrine that we will prevent any foreign nation from interfering with the republics south of us. A small navy has protected them in the past and our present Navy would do it now if the idea is abandoned which has been recently entered upon of making war ourselves upon those republics. Let us have their hearts and their interests, both personal and commercial, with us, and there is not a nation on the face of the earth that would attack one of them. I am an advocate for a navy sufficient to guard our interests.

But you have entered upon a plan of having as many battle ships as Germany, half as many as Great Britain, and accordingly the expenditures of the Navy Department have run up from $20,000,000 to over $100,000,000. The Navy is getting top heavy; there are too many men, too many sailors, too many guns afloat. We have more than enough to protect us and guard all our interests on every sea upon the face of the globe. Let war wait and let commerce be protected. Give to St. Louis what she asks; and, like the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], I would prefer to make it an outright gift; and then turn to the improvements enumerated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Take from war and give the Department of Justice the office home that should be provided for it. Make appropriations for Boston, New York, Baltimore, and the balance of the great ports, and by 1905 or 1906 have them so that the great German and English ships drawing 35 feet of water may enter those ports without being lightered or waiting until high tide. Change the revenue laws in a spirit of perfect fairness to every industry that has grown up in the country, embarrassing none, and reduce the duties on such articles as are necessary to meet the competition that is coming, and coming rapidly.

That, Mr. President, seems to me to be the right method of dealing with this question, and it is the one that will bring the greatest prosperity to the country.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, only a moment on this point of order.

I was a little surprised, although I am not certain that anyone ought to be surprised, that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] should find in this point of order or in the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] an adequate text for a purely political and partisan speech.

I do not think that the Senator from Maryland need have any fear about the safety of the country or its prosperity. He says we have had prosperity for the last few years. He might without any difficulty have been more specific as to dates, and he would easily have developed the fact—which all the country knows—that the prosperity of the country began when the Administration of his party ended.

I think, Mr. President, that there will be a continuance of prosperity. No ship can be on the crest of the wave all the time. There will be, of course, fluctuations. There is no continuity of good times, but the policies of the Republican party, I hope and think, will continue to insure to the people of the United States prosperity and adequate revenue, which will enable us to do what we ought to do as a government at home and enable us to do what we ought to do as a government in our international relations.

Of course we have a larger Navy than we had in the days of the fathers. This is a larger country than it was in the days of the fathers. I suppose even the conservative Senator from Maryland would not contend that a Navy which would adequately stand for the protection and the conservation of the interests of a nation of 10,000,000 people would be expected to answer the purpose, with the growth of the world considered, of a nation of 80,000,000 people.

An adequate Navy does not necessarily mean conquest. It does not necessarily mean a departure from the traditions of the Government or of the fathers.

A distinguished gentleman who recently arrived from other shores deprecated the growth of our Navy, saying substantially that he did not want the flag of the United States to be feared—he wanted it to be loved. The people who love a flag, Mr. President, are the people whose flag it is. The people of other countries are not expected to love any flag but their own.

I should like to have our flag loved here at home. It is loved here at home. That is all we can expect, with here and there a rare exception. What we want is that the flag of the United States shall be loved here at home and respected the world over; and it can only be respected the world over, Mr. President, if it is feared the world over.

By that I do not mean that the nations shall fear it as the flag of a bully, as the flag of a country which seeks quarrels, as the flag of a country which desires conquest. What I mean is only this, that it shall be respected as the flag of a country which is just and generous in its relations with other countries, but which has the power behind it and within it in the last analysis to compel an observance of its rights. I suppose the Senator from Maryland will agree to that.

Now, the Senator's reference to our departure in the matter of conquest from the doctrine of the fathers and to the islands 8,000 miles away sounds to me like an echo from out of the past. I supposed that issue had been laid away. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], the very able and eloquent Senator, made a speech in Omaha not long ago, and if he was correctly reported I understood him as saying that the anti-imperialistic issue, which was unhappily for the Democratic party put before the American people in the last election, is no longer an issue.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do I understand the Senator to say that I stated at Omaha that that issue was unhappily placed before the country?

Mr. SPOONER. No; that it is no longer an issue. I said it was unhappily placed by the Democratic party before the country, because the Democratic party placed it before the country and was overwhelmingly beaten by the country on it. I take the responsibility of that part of my assertion. Does the Senator from Nevada impeach that portion of my observation which implied that he stated there that it had been laid away and that it is no longer an issue?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I stated, if the Senator will permit me, that the issue of imperialism had been made in the last campaign and that splendid presentation of it had been made to the people, and that the appeal to the people had not been successful; that the commercial spirit of the country had advanced so far as to blunt its conscience; that the issue had been determined; that the colonial system was now established and on trial, and that whilst I hoped that the Democratic party would never fail to declare itself against the system of controlling subject peoples against their will, I did not believe that it would be an issue that would gain votes in the coming campaign.

Mr. SPOONER. I pay my profoundest respect to the intelligence and political wisdom of the Senator from Nevada. He is wiser than some of his confrères. The splendor of its presentation only intensified the significance of the popular repudiation of it.

I have but an observation to make as to the reply of the Senator from Nevada, or rather his speech, as he states it. I can hardly understand how a Senator of the United States can impute to the people of the United States that their eyes have been closed by dollars to the demands of liberty or the traditions of the Republic.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say to the Senator that that is what I think.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a very bold thing, Mr. President, for anyone in this country to impeach a majority of the American people in that way. The ideals of the American people and the traditions of the American people belong to them, are cherished by them, Mr. President, more keenly than by any of their representatives, perhaps.

I believe in the American people. I believe the sober second thought of the American people comes as near to the perfection of human wisdom as any standard among men can come; and I think no Senator may safely say to them that they have forsaken their traditions and ideals in a blind, heedless pursuit of the dollar.

No, Mr. President—and I did not intend to refer to this when I rose—the traditions of the American people may safely be left to the guardianship of the American people. When the excitement of the campaign has passed away, the American people think, and what they think is right.

Mr. CARMACK. After the campaign is over, I understand?

Mr. SPOONER. Oh! in the excitement of the campaign and in the first blush sometimes orators like my friend from Tennessee, who is very persuasive, may mislead them, but not for long. They get right, Mr. President, and when they get right they stay right.

Mr. CARMACK. That is what I hope.

Mr. SPOONER. No man at this day can find a listening ear among the American people to criticism of President McKinley or of the action of the American Congress in what it has done by and large in the Philippines. I am not at all surprised, Mr. President, war over there having ceased, our Army having been reduced, the great work of education having proceeded with such rapidity, a legislative body about to assemble over there if it has not already, education bearing rich fruitage there, that this issue is no longer to be invoked as one of potency by our friends on the other side.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that the question of a permanent retention of the Philippines is a settled question?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do not say that, and my friend did not understand me to say that.

Mr. CARMACK. I am trying to understand you now.

Mr. SPOONER. I think, Mr. President, the question of the ultimate policy of the United States in the Philippines is a question not for us to settle, but for the American people to settle, and I say again, no matter what others may think or say, when the time comes that the people of the Philippines are capable of autonomous government, the people of the United States will say they shall have it, under our protection as to their foreign relations, Mr. President, until the time comes when they can be independent with safety to themselves; and when that time comes, if the American people so think, and they will be generous in their judgment as well as just, I am willing to leave it to the American people.

When that day will come I do not know, nor does the Senator, but I trust the people to decide rightly when the time comes. Will not the Senator condescend to do that, likewise?

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I believe I have several times condescended to permit the American people to decide important questions, and I shall probably so condescend in the future.

But what I wanted to know was, not the information given me by the Senator that the American people would settle this question, which I knew before he made his statement to that effect; I wanted to get the opinion of the Senater from Wisconsin, who is a very important part of the American people——

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, Mr. President, I am no important part of the American people.

Mr. CARMACK. I think the Senator is.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will find my opinion stated in too many speeches here. I have not changed it.

Mr. CARMACK. That is what I want to know, whether the Senator has changed it or not.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I have not changed it. It is a good thing for the American people, Mr. President—a good thing for civilization—that we took the Philippines. The first development in a practical way of that fact was when our legation was attacked in China, when the men and women who had gone there as missionaries to spread the gospel of peace were praying for rescue—praying, Mr. President, for protection against death and, so far as the women were concerned, against worse than death—it was a happy thing that we had a great naval and military base in front of China from which we could quickly send two splendid regiments and Reilly's battery to their rescue.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. Does the Senator assume from that that it would be well for us always in the event of future contingencies——

Mr. SPOONER. I have not said that.

Mr. CARMACK. I am asking the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. We have resisted all efforts on the other side to shackle this Government in the future by improvident pledges. I am willing to leave to the future the settlement of the questions of the future, with the supremest faith that when the day comes the American people will settle the question in harmony with righteousness, in harmony with the principles of liberty, in harmony with the traditions of our Government.

But I have thought sometimes, Mr. President, that God—for I am a believer in God; McKinley loved Him and in his last moments expressed his faith in Him—might have had some providential care for those far away whom he loved and who were serving him in the affairs which we weak human beings here were called upon to participate in. I do not know; the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] does not know; but I do know this, that it was a happy, blessed thing when an exigency came like that which suddenly arose in China that war had given to us a great naval and military base in the Philippines.

I want to say to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] that a naval and coaling station in the Philippine Archipelago with adequate fortifications and accompaniments is needed by the United States in every public interest and from every public standpoint, and is in no wise inconsistent with the traditions of this Republic or with our adherence as a people to the spirit of liberty. It was important in Hawaii. I was opposed to the acquisition and annexation of Hawaii. I was in favor—my friends on this side I unhappily differed from—but I never hesitated in the belief that the interests of the United States demanded that we should fortify Pearl River Harbor, in the Hawaiian Islands, making of it an adequate military and naval base for the United States.

Mr. GORMAN and Mr. CARMACK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. SPOONER. To the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. GORMAN. I am always delighted to hear the Senator from Wisconsin, as we all are, but I should like to suggest to him that his answer to the few remarks I made is on an entirely different line from my suggestion.

Mr. SPOONER. I know it is.

Mr. GORMAN. I did not open the discussion as to the right of acquiring or as to the necessity of fortifying and keeping an army in that region, as you have; but what I meant to say, or tried to say, was that while this expenditure is being made because of this new policy you have failed to make provision for carrying on the necessary improvements in this country, improvements as necessary to our people as are fortifications in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. SPOONER. But, Mr. President, we have duties at home and we have duties abroad. I know the Senator from Maryland did not make his speech on the line which I am pursuing.

Mr. GORMAN. Not at all.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator made his speech on the lines of a sinister attack upon what he called the "party in power." I am modestly, and with more or less reluctance, saying a word on behalf of the party in power. The Republican party and its Administration have not, so far as I know, neglected much, if any, the public interests here at home.

Mr. CARMACK. You go to that side for your witnesses.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly, I go to this side for my witnesses, because I know that I will derive on this side accurate and nonpartisan information. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARMACK. I can not, of course, be expected to approve of that.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the safe and wise course.

Mr. CARMACK. Yes; to always appeal to your party.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Maryland speaks about our failure at this session to revise the tariff upon lines, he was careful to add—and I always admire the Senator from Maryland; he is the most adroit and artistic nonpartisan statesman in the world [laughter]—he was careful to add, "on lines which will not interfere with the industries of the country." That is the song of the siren. That is a song which has been sung before; and it was the song of the siren then as it is now. In saying that I speak with due deference to and with the profoundest respect for the Senator from Maryland.

I remember the St. Louis Democratic convention of 1888. I do not know, and never did know, who drew the platform at that convention. It was a wise platform for the Democratic party to adopt; it was one of the most adroit platforms it ever did adopt, and therefore I have always suspected the Senator from Maryland of having drafted it. It recognized the fact that the industries of the United States had grown up under the protective tariff, that the business of the country was adapted to it, and that a sudden reversal of that policy would bring about confusion and industrial paralysis.

That, Mr. President, was the height of wisdom. But in 1892, when the Democratic party again assembled in convention to adopt a platform upon the subject of the tariff, what was it? I never suspected the Senator from Maryland of having anything whatever to do with that platform, because it was not wise. It declared, Mr. President, a protective tariff to be revolutionary and unconstitutional.

Now, which is to be the platform of the Democratic party this year? The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] says "the reunited Democratic party." Having regard for the truth, I can not at this hour say that.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator not allow us to leave that to the Democratic masses when they meet in convention?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know what Democratic masses will be in the majority in that convention.

Mr. TILLMAN. Neither do we know, if the Senator will permit me, whether Governor Cummins, of Iowa, will cut any figure in the Republican convention. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. I will tell the Senator one thing about the Republican convention—I do not know; it is only prophecy—I do not think that the Republican convention will depart much from the platform on the tariff upon which President McKinley was last elected. I will tell him another thing——

Mr. TILLMAN. What is that?

Mr. SPOONER. I speak only for myself. That platform was in favor of adherence to the protective principle and the making of such changes from time to time in schedules as changed conditions might require.

Mr. TILLMAN. Was there not something about reciprocity in there, and have we seen a solitary scintilla of reciprocity since?

Mr. SPOONER. Well, the only "solitary scintilla" of reciprocity we have had since the Senator voted against.

Mr. TILLMAN. I surely did, for the simple reason that it was the kind of reciprocity which you gentlemen are so much in love with. It destroyed the sugar industry in Louisiana, or tended in that direction. The reciprocity of which you pretend you are in favor is one that reciprocates somebody else's interest, but does not reciprocate the individual's; all the reciprocity that the Republicans have ever proposed looks to somebody else surrendering the advantages offered by protection.

Mr. SPOONER. I decline to be drawn into a discussion of the reciprocity question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the Senator must not tantalize us about the tariff.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not tantalize anybody. The trouble with the Senator from South Carolina is that I can not look at him without tantalizing him. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. But you must not speak at him. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] knows perfectly well that the Republican party—that is, I assume he does, and I assume that the Republican party takes the view that I do, although I do not assume to speak for the Republican party—that the Republican party does not intend to enter upon any revision of the tariff at this session of Congress.

Mr. GORMAN. Why not?

Mr. SPOONER. For the reason, Mr. President, in the first place, that a Presidential election is always a very great disturber of business; it has always been so, and it will always be so, more or less. I think it will be less so this year than it was in 1896 and 1900, because the Republican party has eliminated from the situation all doubt as to the financial integrity and sanity of the United States.

Mr. President, a Presidential election is necessarily a business disturber, and I do not think—I do not know what the leaders may conclude to do about it—but I do not think in a Presidential year, in the interest of the people, of the industrial enterprises of the country, of the labor of the country, without regard to politics, that the Republican party will project into this campaign a general revision of the tariff. We will attend to that later.

Mr. President, I did not intend to go into these subjects, but I want to speak a word about the point of order that is pending.

I enjoyed the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I always did like it when these bills were before the Senate. I listened to him some years ago when he originated the phrase "these expositions are becoming an industry." The Senator's reprobation of the Committee on Appropriations I leave to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to take care of. Nobody in the world is better able to take care of the Committee on Appropriations, or anything else for that matter, than is the Senator from Maine.

But the Senator from Massachusetts says he voted with great pleasure for this $5,000,000 contribution to the St. Louis Exposition. I voted for it, but I can not say I voted for it with any great pleasure.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has a peculiar gift, among many, in stating with accuracy and clearness legal and constitutional propositions. I listened with great interest to his speech, and I do not absolutely in all respects find it in my power to dissent from some of the observations which he made. Of course it is the difference between the school of constitutional construction to which the Senator belongs and in which he has been educated and the other school of constitutional construction.

I have voted for many appropriations for the benefit of different sections of our country, some of them in the South, in time of stress and trouble, for which I could have found, from the Senator's standpoint, no justification. Congress has been making such appropriations for many years, supported on that side as well as on this, by one reason and another.

The making of appropriations to these expositions is not a new proposition. We began long ago. I had hoped that the end would come to them; but I see no hope of any end to them without the adoption of a constitutional amendment, except that which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] afforded us to-day, which ends it so far as West Virginia is concerned as long as the Senator from West Virginia lives, because he said he would never ask for any exposition allowance or loan for West Virginia without indorsing the paper himself; which means, of course, that he never will ask for any. [Laughter.]

I voted for the South Carolina exposition——

Mr. TILLMAN. No, sir. You voted to pay the debts of the South Carolina exposition.

Mr. SPOONER. Did I not vote with you?

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. He, and other Senators did vote for the proposition to aid the South Carolina exposition, but then he afterwards voted to let it go out of the bill, because that was absolutely necessary in order that the provision for the exposition at St. Louis might go in.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I voted to let the South Carolina item go out rather than kill a great appropriation bill and starve the Government, but I voted to aid the Charleston Exposition.

Mr. TILLMAN rose.

Mr. SPOONER. I will excuse my friend.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I simply want to give him full credit for being liberal and broad minded in that, as he always is. I do not want to even intimate that he has not always done what he believes to be fair and just and right to the South.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not mean that. I voted, Mr. President, to aid the Charleston Exposition, and afterwards I voted to make up its deficit. Neither did I think I was voting for a steal when I cast those votes.

I voted to aid the Buffalo Exposition, to help make up its deficit, which, it was said, had been caused—and very likely it was the truth—by the awful blight, Mr. President, which fell upon it by the assassination there of President McKinley. I voted for it cheerfully, and I did not think I was voting for a steal.

I had a peculiar pleasure in voting for the Charleston Exposition, because I wanted the people of Charleston to know that nothing in the history of this Republic was any longer remembered against them, and that we were as willing to aid them in bringing together and assembling there the products of the South as we were willing to aid any Northern city.

I voted for the appropriation for the St. Louis Exposition; and the method proposed by this amendment is, in my judgment, a much better one and a much manlier one by which to give the aid of the Government than the original appropriation which was made to St. Louis.

We appropriated $5,000,000 to aid in the great exposition to be held at St. Louis to celebrate the acquisition of the Louisiana purchase, grown into an empire of great States, an empire of empires, splendid in its way. It could not be refused, Mr. President. Upon what theory was it done? It was done with a provision that out of the profits the United States should be reimbursed that $5,000,000; but with a proviso, which the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] read, that nothing therein contained should be construed as making the United States Government liable for any of the debts of that exposition.

Why was that put there? I can conceive of no reason except this, that, having invested in the exposition—having by law made the United States Government a participant in the profits of the exposition—it might be claimed that the Government was a partner in it and therefore liable for its debts.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to interrupt him there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I am sure that the purpose of that was different from what the Senator conceives. If the Government were a partner, it would hardly relieve itself of either the moral or political obligation by a declaration of that kind. I believe the provision was incorporated there to meet the argument that had been made in both Houses of Congress after the New Orleans Exposition and after all the others, that the Government having encouraged—I remember that argument was used—and the Government having invited foreign nations to participate, it was in honor bound to make good the premiums to those foreign exhibitors. That was really the reason why the provision to which the Senator has referred was incorporated.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, having placed this language in the act, it rendered it impossible that there should be any moral obligation upon the Government, because it put the whole world upon notice, by solemn act of Congress, that there could be no such liability.

Mr. BAILEY. That was the purpose of it.

Mr. SPOONER. That was the purpose of it; but it deals not only with moral obligations, but legal obligations. Whatever the purpose of it was, it was a wise provision.

But, Mr. President, this proposition is what? We have paid the $5,000,000. Our participation in the exposition has popularized it all over the world and has been adequate to secure representation from all the peoples and all the governments of the world. Are we not interested in its success? We have a twofold interest in its success. First, we have that principle of noblesse oblige which binds governments as well as men.

We have entered upon it, and Uncle Sam is bound in this way to go along with it like a gentleman, doing whatever can properly be done, conserving the general public interest, to make of it a success. If it were a failure, it would not simply be a humiliation to St. Louis, it would not be simply a humiliation to the Mississippi Valley; it would be sub modo a humiliation to the United States, would it not?

But that is not all. As a mere business proposition, as if this were a "board of directors of a bank," this is a wise appropriation to make. It is a loan. It provides that fortnightly there shall be paid over to the United States Treasury a proportion of the receipts, until the amount of this appropriation or loan has been repaid. It provides that if after a certain time those payments have not discharged this indebtedness—for it is made by the law an indebtedness—the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the right to supervise and impound the gate receipts of the exposition until this amount has been repaid to the Government.

This loan is made perfectly secure unless some overwhelming calamity shall overtake that great region, and if it overtakes that region it will overtake the country. This loan will be repaid.

This proposition is something more than that, Mr. President. It is a question in a way between success or failure. If by loaning this money to that exposition we can help to make a success of it, we not only get back the money which we loan, but we stand an infinitely larger chance of getting back out of the profits the money which we have already invested.

So I shall vote, Mr. President, in favor of overruling the point of order. I think it is a proposition by the committee to protect by a well-secured loan a $5,000,000 investment which the Government has made, and I think it is too late to discuss the question whether we ought or ought not to have made it.

There is something to be said on both sides of this exposition question. It is one thing I am inclined to think—because it has relation to foreign and to interstate commerce—to aid in bringing together, assembling in one place, representatives from all the world to see the products of our farms, our factories, and our industries of every kind, and another thing to pay money to the farmer to buy seed, to plow his field, to harvest his crops. One has relation merely to production; the other has distinct relation to the spread of our foreign commerce and of our commerce between the States. But this I only care to suggest.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. President, I had much hesitation in voting when the first appropriation for this exposition was made. I have none now since the growth of the exposition. This enterprise, as the country knows and the Senate knows, involves an investment of $27,000,000, expenditures of the managers of the Exposition Company, concessionaires, foreign nations, States, and Territories. All the States will exhibit there, and many of them will spend large sums of money. New York, I think, has appropriated $300,000; Massachusetts a hundred thousand; my own State has spent, and will more liberally spend, money upon its showing at this exposition. Foreign governments have been successfully and earnestly besought by Governor Francis to exhibit there. It now appears that foreign governments want twice the space that has been allotted to them, and I understand that instead of 600 acres, as at Chicago, which was the first contemplated scope of this project, the managers are now prepared to include 1,200 acres, so that foreign nations may have a part of the space which they now demand for their unexampled exhibits.

Mr. President, this shows to me that our country has grown so great, that it is now such a world power, that it is the center of such phenomenal development in manufactures, arts, and sciences that all the world will find in this exposition in the twentieth century the culmination of a movement which began in 1851 with the famous Crystal Palace Exhibition in England. This will be much larger and more important than any other in the world. Members of the Senate have seen, as I have seen, exhibitions at Vienna, and Paris, and Berlin, and Geneva, and in Budapest, and in other parts of the world since 1851, but no one has seen anywhere in the world an exhibition of such stately proportions as the one at St. Louis will be.

Not only will all the countries of the world, fifty-three nations of the world, exhibit, but there will be exhibits from our States and Territories and our new island possessions. I am informed by gentlemen who know most about these matters that the Philippine Islands will have and fill a space of 40 acres, and they have contributed a sum of $800,000, which, with a couple of hundred thousand from the exhibition itself, will give a million dollars to exhibit the progress of the archipelago on 40 acres, the splendid development of the policy of the present and the last Administration in the Philippine Islands, and will bury beneath the flowers and foliage of the tropics the deceased "paramount issue" of only three years ago.

In the prosperity of the world there has been in four years no such progress as that which will be displayed by the Philippine Islands on 40 acres of exhibits, which shall show their growth, their prosperity, and the peaceful triumph of a splendid policy which has made, as I understand the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] to admit, practically to be a dead issue that which was three years ago "the paramount issue" in American politics.

But I am not here to discuss politics. I am to talk of this exposition.

It will cover double the space of the Chicago fair. It is an exposition—national, insular, and international. In Philadelphia we began this business. We gave a million and a half as a loan, and it came back to us. Nobody then said it was undignified to be a gate keeper at the great exposition of the progress of the arts and sciences and manufactures and industries of this country. To New Orleans we gave outright a sum. I voted for it, and I never regretted it. In Atlanta we helped the exposition. I was glad to help it, and nobody has ever regretted it. It is true that the making of these expositions is getting to be a national industry.

When we first helped the St. Louis Exposition, then was the time to hesitate, and then I did hesitate. But with the tremendous growth and development of the exposition at St. Louis upon the great plan which, by that able president, Governor Francis, has there been carried out and has won the approval of the country, which has aroused the interest of all the world, I am convinced that now is not the time to stop, not because the Government is bound—the act expressly exonerating the Government from obligation—but because the march of events, the development of affairs, and the unexampled growth of our own country now demand that we see this great project to the end in what promises to be an unparalleled success in the history of the world fairs since 1851 down to 1904.

We have here a proposition which simply sets aside a proportion of the gate receipts and takes it as it comes, in due and orderly fashion, to repay the money now proposed to be loaned, so that they may carry through that which they will carry through with this money, without which they might not, with which they surely will, and all of which money will come back; and it may be that in its success the stockholders at St. Louis and the United States as a stockholder will receive, as those at Chicago received, 20 per cent of the original amount appropriated when we gave the five millions to the exposition. Who can say?

I regard the money, therefore, as entirely safe, and I do not regard it as undignified to lend money safely in this enterprise. The lamented President McKinley well said at Buffalo just before his death that these expositions were the timekeepers of progress; and I do not believe this, the greatest, will be the last. Any barrier, any proviso, any resolution providing that hereafter these projects shall not be aided by Congress would be vain, idle, and impotent. They will come again and again, but, taught by their recurrence, it is our province to see that we begin them slowly, but when we have taken part in making a national and international exhibition like this we must then see that it is worthy of our country, our time, and fairly exhibits the splendid prosperity which this country can show, as no other country ever could show, and as no other country can now show.

I do not believe it is a valid argument which has been urged by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] that if you can not give this money to the men who produce on the field, in the shop, and in the mines, whose products you exhibit, therefore you should not give money here, because, as he says, production precedes exhibition. Production is encouraged by exhibition. When you take the fruit of the field and the product of the mill, of the loom, and the factory, and the farm and exhibit it all together in our country, contrast the products among the States and in the countries of the world, you encourage the man in the field, in the mine, in the shop to go and do better and to increase his skill.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me?

Mr. McCOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Would you not be willing to give him the first encouragement?

Mr. McCOMAS. Surely, Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. If you encourage him by exhibiting his product, you would have no objection to giving it to him in the first instance?

Mr. McCOMAS. I never have hesitated to give him the first encouragement in every vote I could cast.

Mr. BAILEY. You would vote to loan him the money with which to produce the commodities just as readily as you would vote to loan the money for an exposition?

Mr. McCOMAS. We encourage him in a more direct and sensible way by our votes, and I wish that my distinguished friend would do it in the same way. We vote to protect his industry in the field and in the mine and in the factory, and we encourage him to produce to the highest limit of his skill and power, so that by reason of the protective system, which will find its greatest defensive argument in the exhibition at St. Louis, we have said to all the workers of this country of ours, "Here is the splendid illustration of the protection which your country has given you for many years, and especially from 1896 down to 1904."

All the world are attempting to imitate it, and Mr. Chamberlain and the people of England, if they come here, will find the greatest vindication of this encouragement and help to the people on the field, in the farm and the factory in the exposition at St. Louis. And while it is an exposition of peace and not an exposition of politics, yet it is the most convincing and compelling argument in favor of first protecting the people in their production and manufacture and then helping them to exhibit the wondrous fruit of their protected industries in the very center and heart of our continent at St. Louis.

Mr. President, a question which is as long as the Mississippi from its mouth to its source, a breadth of many States on the map, covering in the Louisiana purchase nearly half the developed portion of the United States, is so large and general a question that it troubles me not when it is said it is a local question and not general. We appropriate for the floods of the Mississippi. It is a large problem to the people. We appropriate to preserve its banks; to change its courses, its currents, and to prevent its overflow. We appropriate to protect its banks, reaching down to the empire State of the Senator from Texas himself. That great part of the country is celebrating this momentous event, and why should not we appropriate money with the States embraced in that great purchase for an exposition commemorative of the annexation of half of this Union?

Such an exhibition does more for the producer than contrast his skill and toil with another's. It does more for industry than that. It is an industrial college for the working people, who will go there by the thousands on cheap railway fares and on steamboats and from the Lakes. It is an industrial education to our people who go there in showing our resources, our advance in the arts and sciences, our skill and achievement in architecture, as portrayed in the structures at St. Louis, which now are far superior to the beautiful White City of Chicago and all that the world has thus far seen. All these things——

Mr. FAIRBANKS. May I interrupt the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. McCOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I came into the Senate during the progress of this discussion, and therefore I do not know the origin of it. I ask the Senator for information. Is there any opposition to lending this money to the St. Louis Exposition?

Mr. McCOMAS. There seems to be a good deal of opposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. A point of order has been raised against it.

Mr. McCOMAS. We are discussing the merits on a point of order.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I simply rose for information. I will not interrupt the Senator. I am heartily in favor of the report of the committee.

Mr. McCOMAS. Certainly.

My colleague [Mr. GORMAN] spoke of the arts of peace and criticised appropriations for the Navy and Army. My colleague well said, as I caught his phrase, that in the time of Madison and Monroe our Navy was five times smaller than it is to-day and was yet large enough to defend the Monroe doctrine. There are two answers which occur to my mind to that objection. One is that our Navy, gallant as it then was, was five times too small to prevent the British fleet from coming up yonder Chesapeake Bay and its army crossing the country and burning down the Capitol that stood on this hill.

I do not want the time to come again soon when the Navy will be five times too small, so that another fleet can come up the Chesapeake Bay or the Potomac and burn the Capitol on this hill. Far finer is it when the Navy is five times larger than it was in that period, so that our Government is secure in this capital and we may exhibit yonder in the heart of this continent, in the most central spot, St. Louis, the products of all parts of this country and display our advance in naval and war armament along with all those other products which are the triumphs of peace.

And if it be true that the Navy was then five times smaller than it is now, my final answer in behalf of this appropriation, in this triumphant peace made stable by our preparedness for war, in this splendid prosperity of a country whose exports exceed its imports by about five hundred millions, is that if the Navy was five times smaller then than now, we can make this appropriation and know that this exposition will show the country is five hundred times greater than it was in the days of Madison and Monroe.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I simply wish to reply to some ob ervations made by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

As to indorsing the notes of West Virginia, I want to say in this presence, and let it be recorded for all time, that if West Virginia ever gets $5,000,000 from the Government for an exposition or world's fair and then wants any more money, which I do not think she should want, I, with other citizens of West Virginia, would be willing to indorse the notes to secure the payment of the loan, and that is what I think ought to be done in this instance.

I do not claim any more for my State than I am willing to accord any other State. We are dealing here in the capacity of trustees for a great Government. It is the people's money, not the money of the Mississippi Valley, where the Senator from Wisconsin resides, and which he in part so ably represents on this floor. And of us who do not live in that immediate locality it should not be said that we are opposing this great exposition, the greatest, perhaps, ever held in the wide world, simply because we want certain security for the people's money, which we are asked in this bill to loan.

Mr. President, I distinctly remember when the first five millions was asked for the St. Louis Exposition that there was a good deal of opposition, and it was with great hesitation that many members of the Senate and the House, as I understand it, got their consent to vote for the $5,000,000, and, if I remember correctly, it was distinctly understood that that was all that would ever be asked for this great exposition. And it seems to me this large sum was enough aid for the Government to render even so great and so worthy an undertaking.

Mr. President, I do not want to impede, impair, hinder, delay, or embarrass this great work, in which I feel the deepest interest and of which I am just as proud as the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] can possibly be, but what I wish to insist on is that, with the $5,000,000 the Government has already contributed, and which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations believes, as I understand him, will be a loss to the Government and end in a mere gift, a bonus, a generous donation to a great and world-wide enterprise, should be all that the Government should be called on to do, and there should be something left in the Treasury. When other Senators and I, from other States, wish some small appropriation for public purposes, we don't want the Committee on Appropriations to say, "We can't grant your requests, we must economize. We must take care of the interests of the Government confided to our care."

This exposition will have gotten out of the Treasury, with the five millions heretofore appropriated, $9,600,000. I want to ask what guaranty have we that we will not be asked for more money to carry on the St. Louis Exposition? There may be a deficit of two or three million dollars, and why should not the nation bear this burden?

Mr. President, what I propose is not to stop the exposition or to embarrass it in the least. This exposition can not and will not stop because this Government insists on proper security for the advance asked, nor for any other reason—failure is impossible to it. We merely want the leaders, the men concerned in and in charge of this great enterprise in the State of Missouri and elsewhere, and the great banks and great corporations and the great railroads and the great institutions in the city of St. Louis who are to be most benefited, either to raise this money themselves or guarantee its payment if advanced by the United States. Five million dollars is enough donation. Let these people come forward, and their great banking institutions, and say we will take the gate receipts, which are ample security to us, and guarantee the United States against any loss in making this advance.

Mr. ALLISON. May I remind the Senator from West Virginia of the fact that it is not a donation, but a loan which is to be returned?

Mr. ELKINS. I know; but they are not to return the $5,000,000. This is already admitted, and the $4,600,000 now asked for by the Appropriations Committee is simply a loan or advance. The question is as to the security for the same. Let me say to the distinguished Senator that he, as our great leader in all these matters and in whom we confide, is confronted with a $43,000,000 deficit next year after wiping out all the surplus now in the Treasury. How is he or his great committee to meet this deficit? Not by giving away $4,600,000 of the people's money without demanding, with interest, of the people absolute and undoubted security. The people can not afford to lose this money, and we should take no risk for them or on their behalf.

Where is the money to come from? Mr. President, it is to come from reducing other appropriations to run the Government, and in no other way.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think it ought to go out just now that we are to have a deficit of $43,000,000, for we probably will have no deficit at all.

Mr. ELKINS. I mean for the next fiscal year for which we are now making appropriations, and the Senator understands me, I think. Already the Treasury and the banks are concerned over the immediate payment of $50,000,000 for the canal. I can name the other items—they are very familiar to the Senator; I mean those which will exhaust the two hundred millions now in the Treasury. And now you put on $4,600,000 more of the people's money, depleting the Treasury this much more.

Now, what I am concerned about is where the money is to come from. You can not increase the taxes. It must come out of the Treasury, and if it is taken out of the Treasury, as it will be now, then you will have to cut down the appropriations for running the Government the next fiscal year. You will have to reduce in other directions appropriations which are necessary to carry on the Government. Money will be needed if we want to increase the Navy, if we want to pay the army in the Philippines, which the Senator defends so eloquently and as to which he is always on the skirmish line here to do battle with the other side when they oppose our Philippine policy, which is wise and just. We are glad we have the Philippines and glad to hold them, and we will hold them. We are not here to say what we are going to do fifty years hence or a hundred years hence about the Philippines. I can not make the confident predictions that my distinguished friend makes, that the American people will do so and so. The American people perhaps will soon forget what we say here and what we do here and will be governed by the situation and the conditions and the environment when these questions come up in the future and the years we shall not see. I am willing to deal with the present and leave to the wisdom of future Congresses to deal with the future. We have enough difficulties now before us.

But this is a digression. It has nothing to do with taking money out of the Treasury for the St. Louis Exposition. We must look to our great leader—the distinguished Senator from Iowa—to stand by the Government in the present perils that threaten us. If you are going to part with this money, get undoubted security for the Government. The first condition which I think should have been insisted on by the committee was security, and said: "Gentlemen, you believe in this enterprise." Governor Francis is at the head of the exposition; he is a great financier; he is at the head of great banks and great moneyed institutions. Let him, together with a dozen other bankers in St. Louis, write their names across an obligation to pay this money back to the Government. With this I would not want gate receipts or any other security. Gate receipts are uncertain; I do not know what calamity may overtake the country and impair the gate receipts. Why do you not give them all? Why 40 per cent? Can you not raise enough money in St. Louis to run the fair after it is started? What do you want with the other 60 per cent?

The showing of the Senator from Missouri about the Chicago Exposition would encourage one to believe that there is a great profit in exposition gate receipts. This Government has lost money in connection with every exposition with which it has had anything to do. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], whom I do not see in his seat, got $250,000 for South Carolina, and we could not help giving it to her. We thought we were clean and clear of that. It was a small affair, but the United States lost a quarter of a million.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose the Senator from West Virginia were convinced that the failure to make this loan in aid of the exposition at St. Louis would result in a dismal failure there, would he be willing that the nation—because it would be the nation then—should submit to the humiliation rather than to extend this loan?

Mr. ELKINS. That is a very proper question. It is not going to be a failure if it has the merits Senators say it has. The people of St. Louis, before allowing it to become a failure, will put up this money, as they ought to do, and will not ask the Government for it. I know the people of St. Louis and the State of Missouri; they never fail in any undertaking.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from West Virginia permit me to add to the question of the Senator from Oregon, if he would also fear that it would interfere with the Clark and Lewis Exposition in Oregon?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Lewis and Clark Exposition has nothing to do with the matter. We are discussing the St. Louis proposition. I want to say to the Senator from West Virginia that I am advised that foreign governments have spent between seven and eight million dollars on the ground at St. Louis. Would it not be a great humiliation if the exposition were not a success, and would it not be one that the United States Government ought not to submit to or countenance for a moment?

Mr. ELKINS. Of course it would be a great disaster, but that is not going to happen. I will tell the Senator that Governor Francis and his colleagues and the great Mississippi Valley are not going to allow it to fail. If the Government should not give nor advance a cent beyond the five millions already given, they would not allow this exposition to fail. Of course, if they can get the money from the Government they will do so, but these people will never fail to carry this exposition to a successful conclusion.

Mr. SPOONER. Then we will get our money back.

Mr. ELKINS. Will you guarantee that it will be paid back? You talked to me about my guaranty.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not in the business.

Mr. ELKINS. No, not at all; and you need not be in the business.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think the Senator from West Virginia is in the business, either.

Mr. ELKINS. Not a bit of it. If you ever give my State $5,000,000, I will agree that there will be no more sums asked, and if we are going on with these expositions, I suppose West Virginia will have one in Wheeling within the next five or ten years, and I will look to my friend the Senator from Missouri to stand up and vote to hand us $5,000,000. But I will guarantee him we will not ask for any more, and if we do we will underwrite it by good and sufficient names to indemnify and pay it back to the United States.

The only point of difference here is that, being the immediate guardians of the people's money, the Committee on Appropriations should, when they let go 4,600,000 gold dollars as an advance, which we have in the Treasury in spite of the Democratic party, instead of silver dollars, they should see to it that the United States has something to hold in the way of security.

Bankers do not loan money without security, and the gate receipts may not be sufficient security. I have pointed out, and the Senator from Missouri does not challenge it, that if the great banks and trust companies of St. Louis will come forward and guarantee the repayment of this loan of $4,600,000 it will be ample security to the United States, and they can take the gate receipts for their security.

I am not opposed to the exposition. I am proud of St. Louis and of the people of the State of Missouri. I lived there the largest part of my early life. I want this exposition to be a great success, and it can and will be without any further aid from the United States. In the end, the bankers of St. Louis will loan the money asked for and take the gate receipts as security. They believe they are good security, and time money is now only 4 per cent.

But my personal wishes differ from my duties as a Senator of the United States, charged with looking after the interests of the Government. I am astonished to find the ease with which the great Committee on Appropriations give away $4,600,000, when as watchdogs of the Treasury and economists they will refuse a Senator $50,000 for some needed public purpose. And I am astonished at the unanimity that always characterizes the committee when it wants to do something on a large scale of this kind. I do not say something of a doubtful character at all. How quickly each member of the committee comes to the aid of the whole committee. This makes their decision inevitable.

Mr. BAILEY. Reciprocity.

Mr. ELKINS. But it puts the other Senators on notice, on guard, even when four or five of them, not believing in it at all, are going to vote this money out of the Treasury. I see how the distinguished Senator from Maine is trying to hedge this in with some kind of a provision as to security by putting Treasury agents on guard to watch the gate receipts, but whenever the Secretary of the Treasury wants to put some officer to watch the gate receipts, the managers of the exposition will say, "Get out of here; this is a corporation created under the laws of our State; you have no business here, and away with you."

Mr. PERKINS. The Government has a mortgage or lien on it.

Mr. ELKINS. You have not executed it.

Mr. PERKINS. We will as soon as you vote for this measure.

Mr. ELKINS. No, you will not. You will let it stand just as it is, and I am afraid we will all shake hands and say, "Good-bye to the $4,600,000," as we have to the five millions already gone.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. May I interrupt the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether an estimate has been furnished the committee as to the probable receipts, and whether that information has been given. I understand that under the amendment the Government is to receive in repayment of the loan 40 per cent of the gross receipts. What I should like to know is whether an estimate was made for the committee of the probable gross receipts from which the Government will be reimbursed?

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, this is out of my time. The Senator from Indiana did not ask me that question.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will give me two or three minutes, I will answer it.

Mr. ELKINS. Well, I will have to yield, I take it, because I myself should like to hear what the Senator from Maine has to say.

Mr. HALE. I will not say that the Senator from Indiana was unfortunate, but the rest of us were unfortunate in the fact that he was absent.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I was until a few moments ago detained from the Senate, and came in while the debate was in progress.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt the Senator was well engaged, as he always is.

All of that matter has been gone over. Of course anything that is stated about future receipts must be to a degree conjectural. No one can promise or guarantee what the receipts of the exposition will be. But taking into account what the receipts of others have been, and the magnitude of this great exposition, it is believed that the receipts from gate moneys and concessions, from the 1st of May to the 1st of December, will be considerably more than $20,000,000. It is believed by the committee that the operation of the amendment which is submitted in the bill, the taking of 40 per cent of the receipts, beginning on the 15th of June, will long before the 1st day of December repay this loan to the Government, and that the exposition company will have the balance with which to pay their running expenses after they open, to pay the awards, and the necessary current liabilities that they will be subjected to. The committee has done all that it could do to secure the Government.

Now, I can not predictn or promise the early or the latter rain. I can not guarantee good health in St. Louis. I can not in an affirmative way declare that it will not be found, when the appeal is made to the public, that it is tired of expositions and will not go into the visitation as the public has gone heretofore. But I believe, and the committee believes, that the loan will be repaid, reckoning all these things, taking the chances which all business affairs, all banks, and all trust companies do. Nothing in this mutable world of ours in the domain of human life is absolutely certain. You can not demonstrate in advance. The Senator from Texas is a thoughtful man, and he knows that we can not. But we believe in the light we have had from other expositions that the security is ample. We know that it was the best we could get. It is all we can get. I do not think the Senator or I will be troubled when we come together here next December by finding that any amount of the $4,600,000 has not been paid into the Treasury.

We find fault with these expositions. We do not stick to our text. I recall, as perhaps the Senator from Texas will recall, a debate which took place here at the time when we came to the rescue of the exposition at Buffalo. He and I said then, and other Senators said, and it went nem. con., that after we had got through with that exposition, which was then on foot, never again should there be another exposition. Does the Senator remember that?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. HALE. Yet we will find that this does not end it.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me, here is a bill introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] and already reported, to hold an exposition at Portland, celebrating the Lewis and Clark expedition, and appropriating, I think, about $2,000,000.

Mr. HALE. That is $2,000,000 to start with. That is only the beginning, and the Senator and I——

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from West Virginia promises one at Wheeling within the next three or four years.

Mr. HALE. We shall find the Senator from West Virginia, when that comes up, voting for the proposition of my friend from Oregon, and afterwards he will find fault with the Committee on Appropriations because it has not done the proper thing in diligently guarding the public interest.

The Committee on Appropriations is a committee more responsive to the wishes and desires and beliefs and principles of the Senate than any other committee in this body. That is its business. It deals with immense sums of money. It would not have a shred to stand on in its influence and reputation in this House if it had not always been conservative in its action. The fault is not with that committee. If there is any fault it is in the Senate. The Senate is determined to carry this thing through. It was so determined from the beginning. It was determined on the appropriation of the $5,000,000; and now, when perhaps bankruptcy would stare this great enterprise in the face, if we did not come to the rescue, the Senator from West Virginia can not get the Senate of the United States to commit itself to his policy. He need not spend his time in hammering the Committee on Appropriations. If he had been a member of the Committee on Appropriations he would have been foremost in this matter, because he would have seen it as we do, after full testimony had been taken, and after we gave a patient hearing to everybody who would come, and considered both sides.

The Committee on Appropriations is not to be held by him, by my consent, as responsible for this appropriation, or as taking the people's money. The Senate backs up the committee, and the vote will show that it does; and more, when these other things come about—when the Senator from Oregon organizes his raid on the Senate in favor of an exposition at Portland, which is limited in the range of its constituency, the Senate will be behind that Senator, and if the committee——

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope so.

Mr. HALE. If the Committee on Appropriations undertakes to hold it and restrain it and limit him it will not be able to do it. The Senator knows what he is about.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the Senator from Maine will consent by the time that bill comes up to stand in with the majority of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I do not know but that I will.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope so.

Mr. HALE. I am not by any means fond of leading a procession alone—I claim no superior virtue to any Senator. But I do claim in this regard the Committee on Appropriations has been duly careful, that it has been conservative, that it is proposing a measure here that is for the good not only of this exposition, but of the entire country, and that it can not afford to see this great enterprise run awry in its current and become a bankrupt concern.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ELKINS. I yielded to the Senator from Maine. He made a speech out of my time, and so did the Senator from Indiana. I beg to call the Chair's attention to that fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. I said I was speaking by the leave of the Senator from West Virginia. He yielded to the Senator from Indiana, who asked me a question, which I tried in a feeble way to answer.

Mr. ELKINS. And the Senator from Maine defended the Committee on Appropriations, which, feeling as he does about this matter, was a difficult undertaking for him, I know.

Mr. BAILEY. Now that it is evident this matter can not be disposed of this afternoon, would it suit the Senator from West Virginia better to go on in the morning?

Mr. ELKINS. I want to add only a few words and then conclude. I do not want to be put in the attitude of even embarrassing this great exposition, much less causing it to become a failure. I have no idea that if we were to refuse to pay this $4,600,000 it would be a failure. This exposition is going on and will be a splendid success. If I were a St. Louisian, if I were at the head of this great exposition, if I were a citizen of Missouri, I fear I would try to get all the money that a generous and kindly Government would give, and in this way save the citizens from carrying their share and burden of this great work.

Now, the Senator from Maine, who has an antagonism to expositions—I will not say that is vicious, but an antagonism that is genuine and emphatic—says he is satisfied this is good security. If it is good security to the United States, I ask him to tell me why it is not good security to the banks of St. Louis for a loan of six months? Why should not the banks take the same security that the managers of the exposition say is good and want the United States to take?

Mr. HALE. Now, the Senator is a good business man. To begin with, the banks of St. Louis, the trust companies of St. Louis, the banks of New York, and all the other great mercantile and financial emporiums of the country are not in this enterprise. They are not already embarked in it. They know nothing about it. It is not in their way. I can understand how the banks, if they would lend $5,000,000 to this concern, as they do sometimes to private concerns, would lend them $4,000,000 more to save their $5,000,000. The banks would do then just what the Government is doing now. That is the history of banks; I venture to say it is the history of banks the Senator is connected with, that if they get into a concern and loan to a certain extent they afterwards continue to loan in order not to lose their first loan and in order that their customers shall not fall into bankruptcy. That is the reason why this concern can not go to the banks.

Mr. ELKINS. No, Mr. President, it is conceded that we will never see or get anything of the $5,000,000. I do not want to save that $5,000,000. That is gone glimmering. We will never hear of it any more. What I want is to save this $4,600,000, and we must save it; it is the people's money.

Mr. President, I think the Senator believes confidently that this is good security. He so stated, did he not?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. ELKINS. Very well. If it is good security to the United States, why is it not good security to the people in St. Louis, who are the direct beneficiaries of this great undertaking?

Mr. HALE. They have put in $10,000,000 already.

Mr. ELKINS. This is not putting it in. The banks would give it on the gate receipts—as they say, good security. If the managers of the exposition should say, "We will give you these gate receipts as security," having $4,600,000 in hand, as they have, they would loan the money at 4 per cent.

If this security is good, as the distinguished chairman of the committee believes, as the distinguished Senator from Missouri believes, and as the Senator from Maine believes, why do they not simply go to the banks and say, "This is good enough for the Government; it is good enough for you." The Government makes nothing by loaning money. The United States is not in the business of loaning money. We are charged with raising funds and appropriating them to pay the current expenses of the Government. That is the scope of our business.

The Senator from Missouri believes and the chairman of the committee believes that the gate receipts are good security to the Government. The banks and trust companies of St. Louis have $50,000,000 in their vaults and are willing to loan it to-day at 5 per cent on good security. Governor Francis is the president of the largest trust company in the West. That trust company is able to take these gate receipts and advance this money; but I do not suggest that. I suggest a combination of trust companies. These great trust companies and bankers are in the business of loaning money.

Here is a good opportunity with good security, according to Governor Francis.

Why does not the Appropriations Committee say, "Gentleman, yes, that is an admirable security; we believe in it; now let your banks make the loan." We have given $5,000,000 of the people's money to have this exposition go on. We are willing to give it, and let it go for ever and ever. Now, let the trust companies and banks of St. Louis take this loan at 4 per cent. Don't ask the Government to loan its money. They can afford to take it at 2 or 3 per cent, as the Senator from Maine says, and let me paraphrase his language, which is always——

Mr. GALLINGER. Classic.

Mr. ELKINS. Classic, precise, euphonious, and accurate, and uttered with ponderous deliberation.

Mr. HALE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ELKINS. Now, Mr. President, the Senator is a good business man. I am willing to say this after a long and cherished acquaintance with him, and I am sure he thinks the banks of St. Louis, feeling the gate receipts are good security, should make this loan.

There is no getting away from this proposition unless you just simply want to take the risk. I am glad, if we are going to give this $4,600,000, as it appears we are, that we have got the gate receipts, but I would rather let that go to the banks whose business it is to loan money. I know something of the St. Louis banks. There are upward of $50,000,000 there on deposit to be loaned. Now, why come to us for an advance? The manly thing would be to say: "Here, we want $9,600,000 out of the Government; we have got $5,000,000; now give us $4,600,000 more." That is the way to state this proposition. It is too much to ask.

We never got a cent back from the Chicago fair, I believe—not one cent—and how eloquent was the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] on that proposition; just like the Senator from Missouri; just as earnest about all this matter of protecting the Government and paying back the advance.

Mr. GALLINGER. What are the Chicago figures?

Mr. ELKINS. About $5,400,000 was advanced. I have the figures here before me. Not any of the money that we advanced—$5,384,000—ever found its way back to the Treasury of the United States, and I believe they had the gate receipts.

Mr. CULLOM. No, they did not,

Mr. ELKINS. Very well.

Mr. HALE. There was no security given.

Mr. ALLISON. There was no understanding as respects receipts.

Mr. ELKINS. Was there not as to the $2,384,000?

Mr. ALLISON. Not a dollar.

Mr. ELKINS. I thought you had a promise that it would be paid back.

Mr. HALE. We hoped so, but had no security.

Mr. ELKINS. I thought you had a promise.

Mr. ALLISON. It was not a loan.

Mr. CULLOM. I have said nothing about it because I do not remember definitely as to each proposition, but if this debate runs along a little further I shall have time to look it up and give the exact facts.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator will allow me to suggest that I do not think if he should look up the facts he would be able to find the Government ever got back one dollar.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not quite understand the Senator's suggestion about the mention of private affairs in connection with the State of Illinois.

Mr. ELKINS. Will you let me explain?

Mr. CULLOM. There is nothing pertaining to the State of Illinois or to Chicago in the transaction that is not in every way creditable to Chicago and the State of Illinois. After the aid given by the Government the banks, under the leadership of Lyman J. Gage, came to the rescue, took up the burden, and provided the money. They did not ask for an additional advance.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not think the Senator can make the transaction any clearer.

Mr. CULLOM. I think I can.

Mr. ELKINS. Then I will give the Senator an opportunity tomorrow. I do not want to reflect on the State of Illinois or the city of Chicago, but this is the experience of these expositions, and that is what I am referring to.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator should be a little careful in referring to a State in that way.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not say that the State of Illinois had anything to do with it. I meant nothing in referring to the State of Illinois and the city of Chicago, except as I have stated. After getting $5,000,000, they helped themselves.

Mr. CULLOM. Nobody disputes that.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator himself does not dispute that.

Now, Mr. President, I adhere to this proposition. I do not suppose it is going to find favor, but I say that the banks of St. Louis ought to guarantee this loan and take the gate receipts as their security, and let the United States, if it loses its $5,000,000 which has already gone, not put $4,600,000 in jeopardy, because there must be doubt about the security if the banks of St. Louis will not advance the money on it.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 4, 1904, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1904.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHRIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, HOLLY SPRINGS, MISS.

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar House resolution No. 181 and recommit it to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that House resolution No. 181, on the Private Calendar, be taken from the Calendar and recommitted to the Committee on War Claims. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BRIDGE ACROSS MONONGAHELA RIVER.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill; and, Mr. Speaker, if consent be given, then I ask unanimous consent that the substitute be read instead of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to consider a bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 8889) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River in the State of Pennsylvania by the Eastern Railroad Company.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. DALZELL. I ask that the reading of the bill be omitted and that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 4 of an act approved February 18, 1903, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River in the State of Pennsylvania by the Eastern Railroad Company," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within two years from February 18, 1904."

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended.

There was no objection.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11287, the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill; and, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] and I be allowed to control the time in general debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and, pending that, he asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be under control of himself and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LACEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union for the further consideration of House bill 11287, the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Arkansas about how much time his side will require for general debate?

Mr. DINSMORE. Since I last conferred with the chairman several gentlemen have spoken to me asking for time, and it is probable that there will be considerable time desired upon this side of the House.

Mr. HITT. One hour or two hours?

Mr. DINSMORE. I think even more than that; I think about three hours. I suggest that we can probably reach an agreement about the time later in the day.

Mr. HITT. Very well, we will go on, and agree as we proceed. I now yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY] fifteen minutes.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman, on Monday last our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER], in his speech upon the Panama matter, referred to a petition from New Haven, which had been sent to the Senate as a petition from the representative men of Yale. The petition which he spoke of was sent to the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. HOAR, and contained about twenty names in all. There were among those names some of the professors of Yale, but a very few in number. I am quite sure that my friend from Massachusetts does not wish to inflict a wrong upon any members of Yale, that being the college from which he graduated, and therefore he must take a little pride in that institution.

As I have already said, that petition, containing twenty names, more or less, was sent to the Senate and presented to that body by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. HOAR. But there was another petition, also from citizens of New Haven, sent to the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. PLATT, signed by nearly 100 men, many of them connected with the institution to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers. I do not wish to see an injustice done to any person, especially in my own district, or to have them misrepresented. I do not think that my friend from Massachusetts intended to misrepresent, but he left a false impression upon the Members of the House.

I wish at this time to send to the Clerk's desk the petition which I have just referred to as the one sent to the Senator from Connecticut, that the same may be read. I want the names read, also their profession or business, and when read I wish to make it a part of my remarks, that these names may be published in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas we, the undersigned citizens of New Haven, Conn., without distinction of party, believe that the President of the United States was fully justified in recognizing the independence of Panama; and

Whereas that recognition has been followed by that of most all the great powers of the earth; and

Whereas we believe that the proposed Panama Canal will be of inestimable value to this country and to the world:

We respectfully petition your honorable body for the ratification of the Hay-Varilla treaty.

Charles S. Mellen, president New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad; Percy N. Todd, vice-president New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad; H. M. Kochersperger, third vice-president New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad; James A. Hemingway, president Fair Haven and Westville Railroad; Arthur D. Osborne, vice-president Second National Bank; Samuel Hemingway, president Second National Bank; Charles S. Mersick, president Merchants' National Bank; George W. Curtis, president City Bank; Edwin S. Greeley, president Yale National Bank; William T. Fields, president National Tradesman's Bank; Julius Twiss, treasurer National Savings Bank; Charles H. Nettleton, president New Haven Gaslight Company; Robert A. Browne, treasurer New Haven Savings Bank; E. G. Stoddard, president New Haven County National Bank; George B. Martin, president Union League; A. Heaton Robertson, Lynde Harrison, Charles K. Bush, Henry Stoddard, John K. Beach, Jacob B. Ullman, Henry G. Newton, P. W. Chase, Edmund Zacher, Richard H. Tyner, John W. Bristol, Henry H. Townsend, Edwin C. Dow, attorneys at law; Newton Dexter, editor Gold and Silver Smith; Frank C. Bushnell; Joseph E. Hubinger; William E. Chandler; William J. Atwater; Sherman S. Thompson; Geo. A. Alling; Chas. E. Burton; J. W. Howe; F. B. Walker; Wm. T. Applegard; F. B. Smith; Chas. S. Leete; James D. Dewell, of J. D. Dr. Charles Ray Palmer, of the Yale Corporation; Arthur W. Wright, professor of experimental physics, Yale College; Edward S. Dana, professor of physics, Yale College; Horatio M. Reynolds, professor of Greek, Yale College; John Day Jackson, proprietor of the New Haven Register; Charles Monson, of the Charles Monson Company; M. Sonneberg, of M. Sonneberg Piano Company; John Edward Heaton, assistant treasurer Society Colonial Wars.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPERRY. One moment, please, until I get through with my remarks. Then I shall be glad to accommodate the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, that petition is not a political one. It contains the names of men of all parties, and at least a third of them are Democrats. My friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] the other day asked what Democratic papers favored the Panama treaty.

Mr. THAYER. Not "Democratic"—"influential." I did not say Democratic.

Mr. SPERRY. "Influential," then. Very well. I want to say that one of the signers of this petition is the owner and controller of the New Haven Register, a Democratic paper. I refer to the name of Mr. John D. Jackson.

So far as I can observe, there is not a single national officeholder upon the petition. I present this petition in justice to the people of my district, some of whom think that the speech of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts did not present the matter in its true light and gave a false impression of the sentiments prevalent at Yale University upon this subject. I wish to add that in the columns of the New Haven Register only a day or two ago one of the signers expressed himself upon this subject. I will read an extract taken from that paper:

Prof. Charles H. Smith, of Yale, head of the department of American history, is a stanch supporter of the belief that the United States Senate should ratify the Panama treaty. He was one of the signers of the recent petition sent to the Senate for Senator PLATT to present, which forty Yale professors and fully as many other distinguished New Haveners signed. At the request of a representative of the Register, Professor Smith consented yesterday to discuss the reasons why the treaty should be ratified. He believes that there is a strong moral reason why ratification should be recorded promptly.

This is from one of the gentlemen whose names have just been read at the desk. I sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, that this petition will be treated as it ought to be treated, and treated as the real petition from Yale University. The one to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] referred was a petition simply of about twenty names, and there were only a few names of Yale professors on it.

I will also read, before I close, an extract taken from the Hartford Daily Times, a Democratic paper, under the heading "Stop this nonsense:"

If the Roosevelt Administration has erred in this business, is that any reason why the Democrats in Congress should commit equally grave or more serious blunders? The news from Washington indicates that instead of making the best use of their opportunity in the present situation the Democrats of the Senate are going to make the very worst possible use of it.

[Applause.]

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to make a reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY]. I listened with attention and interest to what he read—the petition from his constituents and the excerpts from a newspaper—upon the subject of the ratification of the treaty with Panama. I merely want to call attention to the fact that it does not make any difference whether Republicans or Democrats join in such a request of Congress. Unfortunately there are some Democrats who are influenced by the same motives that influence all the Republican party—that of selfishness and greed and a desire to get something, no matter by what means it is obtained. I regret it very much myself, and other patriotic citizens regret it. The only thing in which I find great comfort is the fact that the Democratic party as a party does not do such things.

I notice that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY], in reading the extract from the paper, dwelt with peculiar emphasis upon one portion of it in which Prof. Charles H. Smith, of Yale, is credited with having said that there was a strong moral reason why the treaty with Panama should be ratified. Of course we have nothing to do here with the ratification of the treaty. Nevertheless, Members of this House have a right to their own opinions and to the expression of them upon questions of as great importance as is that. But, Mr. Chairman, instead of hearing statements read from newspapers, which, if the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] were upon this side of the House he would characterize as platitudes, it is unfortunate that we can not get the information and the reasons given which show that there is a moral obligation upon us to ratify that treaty.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has characterized what has been said upon this side of the House as platitudes. Of course there were no platitudes in his speech which he made on Saturday. It was no platitude for the gentleman from Ohio to say that the most brilliant star in the diadem of the present President of the United States is his conduct in this Panama affair. That is not a platitude; that is merely an inaccuracy, a mistake. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] That is all there is to that. When I rose, however, Mr. Chairman, all I desired to say was that it was very much better to give a body like this—where men are assembled for the purpose of taking into their care and keeping the interests of a great government—instead of declarations of the kind which has just been read, reasons, something which appeals to the human intelligence, something that may guide our conduct. Of course I know that the gentleman from Ohio has a peculiar aversion to platitudes, but I will say that we upon this side do not like platitudes either, especially when it comes to dealing with a question of as serious importance as is this.

Names have been read by the gentleman from Connecticut of people who think that this treaty ought to be ratified. Why, Mr. Chairman, in my own part of the country there are people who say that the treaty ought to be ratified because "we ought to have the canal; we have got to have it." Why, Mr. Chairman, I have had a constituent of mine say to me—he is a director of a bank, and I observe that the greater part of these names upon the list read this morning by the Clerk of the House, in the paper sent up by the gentleman from Connecticut, are the names of bankers—this gentleman, a director of a bank, said to me, "I am glad the President did it; it was a measly sort of a thing to do; but I am glad he did it, because we want the canal." I said, "Yes; I may need the money that you have in your vaults; but you would hardly justify me in taking a jimmy and crowbar and going and breaking open your safe and taking out that money." It looks to me as if the action of our Government in this matter, while not quite such as I have just described, was nevertheless reprehensible and not defensible.

This is all I desire to say. I yield now for one hour to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of the Fifty-eighth Congress I introduced for the consideration of this body an amendment to the laws upon extradition, which provision I desire the Clerk to read, after which I shall make such remarks as seem to me necessary upon the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

If the governor or executive authority of any State or Territory to which such fugitive person has fled shall refuse the demand of the governor or executive authority of the State from which said fugitive fled, as above provided, then the governor or executive of the State from which said fugitive fled may file before any circuit or district judge of the United States of America a certified copy of said indictment or affidavit and a copy of his requisition so made and refused in whose district said fugitive is found, whereupon said judge shall issue a writ commanding the marshal of said district to bring the body of said fugitive before said court, and the only question subject to inquiry of said circuit or district judge shall be as to the identity of the person of said fugitive. If said judge ascertain that said fugitive is the same person that has fled from the State of the demanding executive for whom said requisition was made and refused, he shall issue a commitment requiring said marshal to turn over to the executive of the demanding State, or his agent, the body of said fugitive. An appeal by either party shall lie in such case, as in all other felony cases, to the Supreme Court of the United States of America.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, that there is a necessity for some law in aid of the States in matters of extradition of criminals from one State to another there will be no dispute. The existing conditions in two States, I may say, of this Union to-day make it necessary that such legislation should be placed upon our statute books. The Constitution of the United States, clause 3, of section 2, of article 4, provides:

A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another State, shall on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled be delivered up to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

Mr. Chairman, this section certainly means something. We are certain that it says something. Drawn in the morning of the Republic, by the fathers of this Government, it stands the severest test. It declares that the fugitives shall be delivered up. It takes from the governor upon whom the demand is made the privilege of discretion. It gives to the State whose laws have been violated the right to demand the fugitive that violated its law and fled from its sovereignty. If this section is meaningless, if a governor has the right to set himself up as the trial court, to pass upon the guilt or innocence of the accused, if he has the right in partisanship to say that a sister State of this Union will not afford a fair or impartial trial, then the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution was greatly amiss of their real purpose when they failed to so declare in this section of the Constitution.

If a governor of one of the States that constitute this Union has the right to arbitrarily refuse to deliver up a fugitive, then it is possible for one single State of the Union to become the rendezvous of every violator of the law in the Republic. Crime can run riot. Outrages upon the citizen, upon property, upon the law, can be committed by culprits with impunity, and all that is necessary to manumit the culprit from the vengeance of the law is one governor of a single State.

I know of nothing, Mr. Chairman, that will tend more greatly to peace between the States than for this Congress to pass some law that will make effective this provision of the Constitution. I observe that section 1 of Article IV says:

Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

This bill that I introduced offers a remedy for these outrages. It provides what effect the proof of the judicial proceedings in a State shall have; that in case the governor refuses a requisition properly made, then the governor of the State demanding the fugitive can proceed to obtain custody of the culprit by filing a copy of his requisition, so made and refused, and then it becomes the imperative duty of the judge of the United States district or circuit court to issue his warrant for the arrest of the fugitive, and then the sole question, of which he shall be the judge, is the identity of the fugitive; and if he is found to be the one demanded, he shall then make an order delivering over such prisoner to the authorities of the State from which he fled.

This section 1 of Article IV, which immediately precedes the section in regard to fugitives and their deliverance, evidently was passed for the express purpose of giving Congress the power to pass such laws as would make it impossible for a State to become the hiding place of violators of the law. It is also provided by the Constitution, clause 18 of section 8, Article I, that—

Congress shall have the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or any Department or officer thereof.

Now, by this clause Congress certainly has the power to pass such laws as will enforce the provisions in regard to fugitives from justice.

The United States Supreme Court, in the case of Mahon v. Justice (127 U. S., p. 705), the opinion delivered by Justice Field, used this language:

Whether Congress might not provide for the compulsory restoration to the State of parties wrongfully abducted from its territory upon the application of the parties or of the State, and whether such provisions would not greatly tend to the public peace along the borders of the several States, are not matters for present consideration. It is sufficient now that no means for such redress through the courts of the United States have as yet been provided.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if Congress has this power—and it is evidently clear to every reasonable mind that it was the purpose of the court, by inference at least, in this decision to say that it did have—why has it not the power to reach its strong arm into the State and deliver over one that violated the law to the State in which he committed the crime? Would it not "greatly tend to the public peace along the borders of the several States," not only along the borders but through the entire State?

I can see no good reason why Congress would have this power, which would clearly be in aid of the right of one individual who had been wronged by abduction to be delivered back to the place of his former abode, and Congress would be denied the power to deliver back to an outraged Commonwealth of 2,000,000 people one who had murdered her citizen, violated her law, and fled from her courts. [Applause.]

In the one case it would be a remedy for one person who had been wronged; in the other case it would be a remedy for 2,000,000 people that had been outraged. In the one case it would tend to give peace to a wronged citizen; in the other case it would tend to give peace, law, and order to a whole Commonwealth.

Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States in his message to this Congress on December 7, 1903, saw proper to make some observations in regard to the matter of extradition. But it was a source of great regret to myself, as I know it was to the people I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, and as I believe it was to the great body of the American people, that he saw no necessity for dealing with the question of extradition between the States. But I notice that in his message he uses this language in speaking of the bribe givers and bribe takers in St. Louis:

It should be the policy of the United States to leave no place on earth where a corrupt man, fleeing from his country, can rest in peace.

This is a lofty sentiment. It is one that carries us back to the days of the fathers. In its contemplation we become oblivious to this age of commercialism and of imperialism. In fact, sir, it's a whiff from the garden of the Revolution. But what I want to ask the distinguished Rough Rider is this: Why in his message did he not say that it should be the policy of the United States Government to make it impossible for a fugitive, fleeing from his country, to rest in peace under the flag of the United States of America, or anywhere throughout the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Proceeding to deal with this question, he says further:

There is no reason why bribery should not be included in all treaties as extraditable. The recent amended treaty with Mexico, whereby this crime was put in the list of extraditable offenses, has established a salutary precedent in this regard. Under this treaty the State Department has asked, and Mexico has granted, the extradition of one of the St. Louis bribe givers.

There can be no crime more serious than bribery. Other offenses violate one law, while corruption strikes at the foundation of all law. Under our form of government all authority is vested in the people and by them delegated to those who represent them in official capacity. There can be no offense heavier than that of him in whom such a sacred trust has been reposed, who sells it for his own gain and enrichment; and no less heavy is the offense of the bribe giver. He is worse than the thief, for the thief robs the individual, while the corrupt official plunders an entire city or State. He is as wicked as the murderer, for the murderer may only take one life against the law, while the corrupt official and the man who corrupts the official alike aim at the assassination of the Commonwealth itself.

Assassination of the Commonwealth! What shall we say of the man who is this day protected and has been for more than three long years by a Republican governor who is the dual offender, adding to the bribe offerer and giver the awful crime of murder? What shall we say of such a one, who was offered immunity and protection by the strenuous Rough Rider himself? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We see him in this instance as Roosevelt, the governor, trampling upon the laws of extradition, violating the comity of States, and offering to one indicted for the great crime of murder protection from Kentucky courts.

The Albany Argus of May 28, 1900, said:

Taylor's flight is nothing but the logical outcome of his whole previous career. It's the act of the cowardly bully driven to bay. He is the logical candidate in Kentucky. It's a pity that New York is not his chosen refuge, in order that our citizens might have a chance to pass judgment on Governor Roosevelt's offer to shield a fugitive from justice.

The Indianapolis Sentinel of April 24, 1900, said:

And now it is reported that Governor Roosevelt will not surrender Taylor, of Kentucky, on a requisition from Governor Beckham. It would be interesting indeed to have the head civil-service reformer of the country join in protecting a fugitive from justice from the process of the courts. Possibly, however, like Hernly, he may think that political assassination is justifiable if the victims are Democrats.

In his message the President says that these bribe givers and bribe takers should be hunted down; that you ought to cross the ocean to bring a man back that violated the law. I say, very well and good, but let us cross the Ohio River first and bring the murderer back to Kentucky before you do that. [Applause.] Why, Mr. Chairman, I believe this message was in reality given to Congress in a vein of humor.

I notice he talks so much about the violators of the law in Missouri and wants to cross the rolling sea to bring them back. I read only day before yesterday that Odell, governor of his own State, the master of his political fortunes in New York, gave protection to the millionaire, Mr. Ziegler, charged with bribery and corruption in Missouri, from the Missouri courts, and denied the requisition of Governor Dockery.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the message of Mr. Roosevelt, in wanting to reach out for criminals and violators of the law across the sea, is but the bugle call to all the fugitives on the face of the earth to come back home, and if they can stand the Republican administrations of New York and Indiana they can be protected there. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

No such punishment as being an exile from home can be visited upon a man if he happens to take the life of a Democrat. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So, when I contemplate the anomalous position of Roosevelt the governor and Roosevelt the President, I am forced to declare that another greater than R. Louis Stevenson would have to rise to properly characterize a greater than Dr. Jekyll or Mr. Hyde.

Durbin, the man to-day, giving protection to this violator of the law, this man that Kentucky, through her grand jury has indicted for the crime of murder, has for more than three long years denied the right of the sovereign Commonwealth of Kentucky to bring that man back and let him stand his trial before a tribunal of her law. And I notice that when Durbin comes to town he is wined and dined by this great Don Quixote upon extradition, who absolutely confides to Durbin the right to give to the waiting and anxious world the news that "HANNA can run for the Presidency if he wants to." [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

And when we all read that we again said, "The king can do no wrong," and as Durbin starts back to Indiana from his confidential talk with the President, we hear him say amid the applause of all the fugitives of the land, as he speaks of his own State of Indiana, saying of it:

> Here, here is the land, of every land the pride,
> Beloved by fugitives, o'er every land beside.

Mr. Chairman, their excuse for not honoring this requisition was that Taylor could not have a fair trial. Let us see whether that proposition can stand the test. What did Taylor say before the indictment was returned, when he heard an indefinite rumor in regard to same? I have his own signed statement here, that he gave to the world, and in it he does not say that he could not obtain a fair trial in that Commonwealth. He does not say that juries are corrupt. He does not say that courts are polluted. But listen to Taylor himself before he had heard that certain confessions had been made, that certain witnesses had been called before the grand jury, that the "cat was out of the bag."

Let us see what he says when he felt secure, little dreaming that the world would ever know that he offered $2,500 and a pardon for a human life; that he said, "Goebel has but twenty-four hours to live," and with the wisdom of a prophet this awful prophecy became a reality; that he said, "You must act first and then I will call out the militia," and the wounded man had not been carried from the place of his fall until the tramp of the militia was heard upon the statehouse grounds; that he had issued pardons to men before conviction; that he was the bone and sinew and moving factor in the procurement of Goebel's death.

Here is what he said then, on April 7, 1900, and gave it to the Associated Press bearing his own signature, and it went throughout the States in the American Union:

> Once for all I desire to say neither directly nor indirectly had I any connection with the assassination of Senator Goebel. I am a citizen of this State, amenable to its laws. I am not a criminal, nor shall I ever become a fugitive from justice. Whenever indicted, if such an outrage should ever be committed—

Does he say, "I will flee to Indiana and seek the protecting ægis of a Republican governor in the name of politics?" No; but he says:

> I shall appear for trial conscious of my innocence and of the ultimate triumph of right and justice.
> W. S. TAYLOR.

There was nothing said then that he could not obtain a fair trial, but what happened? Why, sir, in less than two weeks from that time we heard of him in Washington, and in three days of that time we heard of him in New York, in consultation with Governor Roosevelt, and what occurs? Does he come back to Kentucky? Does he stand true to his declaration that he would never be a fugitive from justice? No, indeed. All this courageous statement had faded away as his own guilty conscience commenced to tell him that the crime of the great as well as the small was subject to the truth of that inexorable axiom, "Murder will out."

I say spurred on by this he sought the State of Indiana, and in the name of Republicanism he begged its protection. And notwithstanding four years ago this day one of the brainiest and, as we believe, the bravest and knightliest of all that fought for the common people, died from a wound that the indictment of our court said Taylor procured by offering $2,500 and a pardon to the man who fired the fatal shot, he has been protected, walking as a free man almost in sight of the blue grass under which his victim sleeps.

What does Bradley say—the leader of their party, Taylor's confidential friend, his attorney in the contest, ex-governor of his State? Here is what he said on April 23, 1900, that is published in the Louisville Commercial, the Republican organ of that State:

[From the Louisville Commercial (Republican), April 23, 1900.]

I do not believe the report to be true that he is in New York attempting to prevent the honoring of the requisition for his return to this State. Governor Taylor has publicly declared that he was not and would never be a fugitive from justice, and that if indicted he would respect the law and meet his accusers face to face. Therefore there remains but one course open to him, and that is to return as soon as he can and meet the indictment like a man. Any other course would be rank injustice not only to himself but to those of his friends who have been accused of so foul a crime. I do not know whether an indictment has been found against Governor Taylor, but if it has I have no doubt that he will promptly surrender himself into the hands of the law, and believe any intimation to the contrary does him rank injustice.

That was issued by William O. Bradley. I know that it has been said, in order to excuse this outrage that is daily being perpetrated, that he could not obtain a fair trial; but, sir, Kentuckians are too courageous, their history of one hundred years behind them tell in tones too loud that this statement is false. You protected him because you said the courts of Kentucky were corrupt.

Taylor fled to the State of Indiana about May 15, 1900, and it was from Indiana that he made his triumphal tour to the Republican national convention, where the public press told us that he received an ovation second only to that of Roosevelt, and there in the State of Indiana he has since remained.

On January 1, 1901, the Republican party obtained control of the court of appeals, which court is the court of last appeal in all criminal and civil cases in our State. They retained this control of that court till January 1, 1903. Upon that bench were Guffey, Durelle, O'Rear, and Burnham, four Republicans out of the seven judges that constituted that court.

Do you tell me that he could not obtain a fair trial where his own party controlled the court to which he had the right to appeal his case? The chief justice of that court was Guffey, his old law partner, and this court of appeals would have had the right, if this case against Taylor was a persecution instead of a prosecution, was one of falsity rather than of truth, one without evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury, one procured by corruption, to have reversed the case and remanded it to the lower court with directions to dismiss the indictment, which would have been and remained the law of the case.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, with this condition existing in Kentucky, the Constitution of the United States, providing that "full faith and credit shall be given to the acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State," was being trampled upon. The provision of the Constitution providing that the governor should surrender a fugitive upon demand of the executive was being grossly violated. With this court Republican, the demand being made for his extradition, Durbin refused to surrender him to the authorities of the State of Kentucky because he said Taylor could not obtain a fair trial.

Notwithstanding, if all he said be true, it was in the power of the Republican court to have directed the dismissal of the indictment and let him go as free as the lark that sings in the sky. Why, my friends, take this matter home to yourselves. Suppose that the murderer of McKinley had been able to flee after he had committed that awful crime. Suppose he had come to Kentucky and the governor of Kentucky had as little respect for his oath, for the Constitution, and for the laws of his country as Durbin had. Czolgosz would to-day be walking Kentucky's soil, breathing her pure air, and the nation mourning the death of one of the greatest of her Presidents.

Is that proper? Do you want to make that possible in our magnificent country? Suppose when you came to us and told us that you wanted to return him, so that he might have a trial for taking the life of your greatest leader, McKinley, the man who lifted you to the mountain range of popular favor, and suppose we should have said that you shall not have him for trial until the United States Government had brought about a condition which will compel a State to return to us our criminal, who took the life of one we loved, no less than you did your leader. Your indignation would have known no bounds. Retaliation would have met with indignation at your hands. Congress would have been assembled in extraordinary session, and a law immediately placed upon the statute books such as I propose here.

Mr. Chairman, the conduct of Governor Durbin, viewed under every searchlight, measured by every yardstick, weighed in every balance, is such an outrage as to properly characterize it the poverty of the English language must stand admitted. [Applause on Democratic side.]

The greatest right that a State can have is the right to try those who have violated its law and fled from its dominion. It is an enlargement of State rights. It is the very sovereignty of the State itself.

I know, sir, that many epithets have been hurled at the courts of Kentucky, but I stand here to defend them, though they need no defense at my hands. Their decisions have been quoted and approved the world around. The judicature of the civilized earth has been made richer, wiser, and greater by their contributions. Equity and justice have both alike welcomed their decisions as examples of their teaching. Innocence in rags, justice without a friend, weakness without a staff, all in full and rounded measure proclaim in tones that defy partisan rancor, and political malice, of their incorruptibility. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And, sir, when murderers shall find no longer an Indiana of refuge, when requisitions shall no longer be dishonored, when those who laid the miserable plot and took the life of William Goebel shall have been gathered by that dark messenger that needs no requisition, when those who protected them shall live only in infamy, Kentucky courts—God bless them—will still live, administering the law in its strength and justice in its purity. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I believe that whether this Congress acts or not; whether Kentuckians may assemble this day a year hence around the grave to place flowers upon it in sweet remembrance of the murdered dead, knowing the chief conspirator is yet unmanacled by the law; recounting the wrong perpetrated by the protection of his murderers—I say whether that would occur or not, in my judgment Taylor will have to hunt another place of refuge, because the outraged people of Indiana will rise up in their might and repudiate the Republican policy by electing a Democratic governor in that Commonwealth. [Great and continued applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] such time as he may desire.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave for the gentleman from Kentucky to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that his colleague may extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JAMES. I yield back to the gentleman from Arkansas such time as there may be remaining to me.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with regret and amazement to the remarkable address of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], and his unwarranted and ill-tempered attack upon the governor of the State of Indiana. I am not here to defend the action of the governor of my State. He needs no defense among people who are acquainted with his high character and distinguished ability, and with the history of the election in the State of Kentucky in the year 1899 and its results, including the assassination of Mr. Goebel, and the prosecutions and trials following that lamentable affair.

In 1899 Hon. William S. Taylor was as honestly and fairly elected governor of the State of Kentucky by the votes of the sovereign citizens of that State as any man was ever elected governor in any State. [Applause on the Republican side.] His election was conceded and certified by the Democratic State election board, appointed under what is popularly known as the "infamous Goebel law."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would like to disabuse the gentleman's mind. The fact is that the election of the governor and lieutenant-governor was to be decided, as it is in every State I know of, by the legislature of Kentucky.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The election was canvassed and certified by the State election board appointed under the Goebel law, as I understand it, composed of a majority of Goebel Democrats. They certified to the election of William S. Taylor as governor and Caleb Powers as secretary of state, and a large portion of the Democratic party, a large share of the Democratic press in that State, acknowledged and admitted the right of Governor Taylor and Mr. Powers to the offices to which the people of the State had chosen them.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is not that just as true of every Democrat that has come to this House and been thrown out by a Republican contest? Do they not come with a certificate of election?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. We try contested-election cases here, and there is no one who is acquainted with the habits and temperament of this body that believes for a moment that it has the spirit and capacity to administer justice where political questions are involved. This body passes upon the election and qualifications of its own Members in response to the fundamental principle that it must be absolutely independent of outside control. It is a fundamental safeguard to the independence and integrity of the House, and that overmastering principle is greater and more important than the right of any individual to membership. After the election in Kentucky in 1899 William Goebel contested the right of his successful opponent to the office of governor, and under the laws of that State the contest had to be taken before the State legislature, a body that was essentially partisan, a body that everybody knew in advance would decide according to its partisan majority. The people of Kentucky felt that popular government was at stake, and their indignation over an undisguised purpose to deprive them of the right to select their own governor and State officers was aroused from one end of the Commonwealth to the other. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand the gentleman makes a thrust now at the body that tried the contests for governor and lieutenant-governor in Kentucky.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman may so construe my remarks.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. You say the legislature was partisan and incompetent to try a contest. How many States in this Union are there that have any other contest boards for governor and lieutenant-governor?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. There is not one.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is no such procedure in the State of Indiana. That State provides for no legislative contest of the election of governor. The courts and not legislatures are the proper forums in which to contest elections for all executive and ministerial offices.

The contest for the governorship in the State legislature involved the fairness of the election in over a third of the State of Kentucky. The supporters of Mr. Goebel challenged the integrity of the election in every precinct in the great city of Louisville. They charged in a large number of other counties that the ballots were printed upon paper so thin that the mark of the voter indicating his choice could be seen through the ballot. The contestee offered to prove and did prove that in nearly every instance where such ballots were used they were printed and furnished by Democratic election boards and officers, men who were friends and supporters of Mr. Goebel for governor.

The committee selected to hear the contest made a general report to the legislature recommending the seating of Mr. Goebel, and by implication, at least, they justified the exclusion of the votes in one-third of the counties in the State of Kentucky, including the city of Louisville.

Gentlemen talk about the assassination of the Commonwealth by the failure of the governor of Indiana to surrender Governor Taylor to the Kentucky authorities for trial for the murder of Mr. Goebel. Who are the real assassins of the Commonwealth in the State of Kentucky? Are they not the men who ruthlessly and arbitrarily overturned the elections in 1899 and unseated from office men who were honestly and fairly chosen and put in their places men who were repudiated by the voters at the polls? The integrity of the ballot lies at the very foundation of republican institutions, and assaults upon that integrity are death blows to popular government. The gang of unscrupulous politicians who collected at Frankfort in the winter of 1900 and conspired to cheat the people of the State of Kentucky of their fundamental right to choose their own officers were the assassins of the Commonwealth. Public officers charged with the administration of justice, who filled the jury boxes with the names of partisan Democrats for the purpose of trying men accused of a political crime, were assassins of the Commonwealth.

What greater crime than the prostitution of courts to partisan ends could be committed against any civilization? I do not claim that the institutions and citizenship of the State of Kentucky are not in ordinary matters of as high a standard as those of any other State in the country. That State has a splendid history and a brave and chivalrous citizenship, but notwithstanding conditions have been such since the election in 1899, in relation to the result of that election and the contest following, that the public mind in the State of Kentucky has been and still is absolutely unfit to deal with the question of the guilt of those indicted for the murder of Mr. Goebel with any degree of fairness or justice. This condition may not exist in all parts of the State of Kentucky, but that it does exist in Scott and Bourbon counties—counties from which the juries were drawn—is true beyond a cavil of a doubt.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman may.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Suppose Taylor was elected, suppose there was a contest, and suppose that Goebel was declared elected; suppose that sentiment was aroused; does that justify assassination?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am not here, Mr. Chairman, to justify assassination. No provocation justifies a crime so foul and dastardly, but I do propose to submit some reasons in explanation of the attitude of the governors of the State of Indiana—Governor Durbin and his distinguished predecessor, Governor Mount—in refusing to recognize the requisition of the governor of the State of Kentucky for the return of Mr. Taylor, to be tried in the Kentucky courts under conditions then existing. I expect to show that Governor Taylor was not a fugitive from justice, but a fugitive from injustice, oppression, and tyranny.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman one other question, if he will permit. I would ask whether he himself doubts that Mr. Goebel was assassinated for political reasons?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, I do not know that that has anything to do with the question before the committee. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] What I may feel or think about the character of the assassination has nothing to do with the question now under discussion. Everybody admits that it was an execrable crime. During the period of intense excitement in the State of Kentucky immediately following the institution of the contest Republicans and Democrats from all parts of the State met at the State capitol to insist that the will of the people should be carried out, that honest elections should be respected, that unscrupulous political buccaneers should not be permitted to take away from the people of the State the right to choose their own officers, and in the white heat of partisan feeling unfortunately somebody shot and killed Mr. Goebel, the contestant.

I am not here to justify that act. It was a crime, a crime against humanity, a crime against civilization, a crime deplored in every State in this country. Immediately proceedings were set on foot to hunt out the perpetrators. The political machinery in the State of Kentucky was in the hands of the Goebel Democrats. A hundred thousand dollars was voted by the legislature to discover and convict the criminals. Indictments were returned by partisan grand juries against the Republican governor and secretary of state, amongst others, charging them with the crime. All, I believe, of the candidates on the Republican State ticket, all of the men who were elected by the suffrages of the people to State offices, were included in the indictments, charged with conspiracy to murder or with being accessories before the fact.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the gentleman to say that all of the gentlemen who were on the Republican State ticket were included in the indictments?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I may have included too many. I said all. There were too many. The governor and the secretary of the State I know were indicted.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. And that is all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes, and the secretary of state was tried and tried again, and tried a third time, and respectable Democrats and Democratic papers all over the State of Kentucky denounced the character of the trials and convictions as infamous.

Mr. STANLEY. Can the gentleman name one respectable Democratic paper that ever did that?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Oh, there are few respectable Democratic papers in that State. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. STANLEY. May I ask the gentleman if that is the spirit in which he proposes to denounce partisanship, by saying that there is not a respectable Democratic paper in the State of Kentucky?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is the spirit the gentleman is manifesting in this controversy this morning. The gentleman is not showing a judicial spirit.

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, the gentleman from Michigan is. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; he always does.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I prefer not to now. The organization of the court and jury and the conduct of the trials in the Powers case was condemned by honest-minded, cool-headed Democrats, I will say, and by newspapers that had theretofore been known as Democratic papers, throughout the State of Kentucky. Goebelism came to be a political issue in that State. Governors and State officers were elected and defeated on that issue. Candidates for seats in this body were elected and defeated upon the issue of Goebelism. Many will remember that distinguished Kentuckian, Colonel Berry, who was a Member of the House in the Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, and Fifty-sixth Congresses. He was an anti-Goebel Democrat, and that was his undoing—he is no longer here.

In the empaneling of the juries in the trials of Caleb Powers they were packed by his bitter political opponents. At none of the trials was there a friend of his—a political friend—or an honest representative of his party on the jury.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield now.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that he is misstating the case grossly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, let us see.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. As a matter of fact, on the first jury that tried Caleb Powers there were six anti-Goebel people. Half the jury were anti-Goebel. There were four anti-Goebel Democrats and two straight Republicans, and he could not be convicted without the verdict of every member of the jury.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In the first trial the jury was composed of eleven Democrats and one alleged Republican school-teacher, who depended upon local Democratic officers for employment—a lick-spittle who was worse than any honest Democrat could have been. That is my information of the situation.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I beg, in a most respectful and emphatic way, to protest against the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] as being absolutely without foundation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is it not true that one of the jurymen in the first trial was heralded over the country as a Republican school-teacher? And is it not true that he was employed by Democratic school officers in the county in which he taught?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I did not understand the first part of the gentleman's question. Will he repeat it?

Mr. STANLEY. There are few Republicans in Kentucky who can teach a school. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is very evident that there is something the matter with Kentucky. Nobody seems to have been teaching very effectively down there. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If the gentleman desires an answer to his question and will repeat it, I will try to answer it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand the gentleman claims that in the first organization of the Powers jury there were six Goebelites, four anti-Goebel Democrats, and two Republicans. I say there were eleven Democrats and one Goebel Republican.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I deny that statement most emphatically; and I wish to make the statement further that that gentleman was decidedly against Mr. Goebel, went into the jury box with a decided impression that Mr. Powers was an innocent man, but after hearing the evidence and getting into the jury room, I understand he was the first to suggest that the jury find Mr. Powers guilty.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; and he was employed to teach for another year, and I think he had his salary increased. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAMES rose.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Constant interruptions practically destroy the continuity of my argument, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman is proceeding on the idea of assailing the jurors down there. In order that justice may be done upon the question he is raising here as to the selection of the jury, I ask him whether in the first trial and in each of those trials the question was not raised before a Republican court; and not a single time did the Republican court of appeals of Kentucky sustain the contention that the gentleman is now making here. [Applause.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The question was raised before the local courts; and on the second trial of Mr. Powers affidavits were filed by several people of the county setting out the fact that the names selected by the jury commissioners were all Democrats and Goebelites except, I think, four or five; and the court was asked to set aside the panel and order the selection of a new list of names.

In a county that was nearly evenly divided in politics, there were ninety-five Democratic names in the jury box, and four or possibly five Republican names.

The State had five peremptory challenges, so that not a single Republican was allowed to sit on the jury. The case had become intensely political; it entered into the politics of every township, county, and Congressional district in the State of Kentucky. Powers was on trial for a political crime before a jury composed entirely of his political enemies. Think of such a trial in the twentieth century! The conduct of Judge Cantrill, and the record he made in that case, considering the advanced standards of administering justice, makes the tribunal presided over by bloody Jeffreys on the Taunton circuit eminently respectable. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to ask the gentleman whether he considers that when a man is being tried for murder it is a political question that is on trial?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It may be under some circumstances.

Mr. SHERLEY. It seems to be so under some circumstances.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was made a political question in the State of Kentucky. The question of the guilt of Governor Taylor and Caleb Powers was the Democratic slogan at elections. It was embodied in the Democratic State platforms, and was thundered with impassioned eloquence from the hustings. Every man who voted the Democratic ticket voted Taylor and Powers guilty of the crime that overshadowed everything else in State politics, and the juries that convicted Powers were composed of that kind of men. Is was a political trial, and fairness, justice, and common decency required that the juries should be equitably divided between the two political parties in the county in which the cases were tried.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman know as a matter of law that the question of the political affiliations of a juror is not a question that can be brought before the court in the selection of a jury on the voir dire?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is true enough, and that is the reason the court of appeals failed to take cognizance of that question when presented on appeal, but it can be brought before the jury commissioners, and they can be prevented from packing a jury for the purpose of convicting a man whether he is guilty or not. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. And the evidence in support of that is no greater than the statement of just such men as the distinguished gentleman who is willing, without regard to the facts, to give a distorted version. It is not true that the juries of the State of Kentucky have been packed to convict men.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not charge it as a general proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not true as a special proposition.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I charge it in relation to the trial of those indicted for the assassination of Goebel, and I can go to the State of Kentucky and procure eminent and respectable witnesses by the hundred, aye, by the thousand, who will justify the statement I make here.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman put the proof of some of that in the RECORD when he publishes his speech?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will. I have newspaper extracts and letters by the dozens, and I shall ask the privilege of publishing some of them in my speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, what newspaper extracts?

Mr. JAMES. You say juries were packed with partisan Democrats for the purpose of convicting those indicted for taking Goebel's life?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is the statement.

Mr. JAMES. Now tell me how it was that a jury that was packed as you say tried Captain Ripley and acquitted him, and tried Buck Howard and acquitted him of the murder of William Goebel? How was that if they were juries that were packed for the purpose of convicting anybody or everybody? How was it that those two gentlemen escaped?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Those two gentlemen were men of such insignificance in the politics and society of the State of Kentucky that it would be no credit to the Democratic party to land them in the penitentiary or on the gallows. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] And it is quite probable that some evidence of guilt, a scintilla of evidence, is required to convict even before the juries I have described.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I beg to suggest to the gentleman that Captain Ripley is a man in as good standing as any man on the Republican State ticket in 1899.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I say this, that in the second trial of Powers, in a county where the political parties were nearly evenly divided, every man on the jury was a Goebelite. It was a political trial, I reassert, and Powers had no chance whatever for his life or liberty. That is the proposition I assert here. In the name of common fairness and common decency why was not the jury divided politically? Why were there not three or four real, genuine Republicans on the jury? In the third trial the jury that tried Powers was composed of eleven Goebel Democrats and one Goebel Republican. The Goebel Republican, the evidence showed, had voted for Goebel for governor, and had his picture framed hanging up in the drawing room of his home.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. McDERMOTT. The governor of every State in the Union is supposed to be under the State and Federal Constitution. Does the gentleman consider that, a requisition being made upon the governor of any State in this Union to surrender one charged with the crime of murder, he has the right to consider the question of whether or not the man so charged will receive a fair or an unfair trial if he is returned to the State from which the requisition issues?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He always must consider that question, and it is his duty to presume that ordinarily in all the States justice will be administered fairly. He has a right to act upon that presumption. He ought to act upon it, and I concede the vital importance under our system of government, in the administration of the laws, that State authorities should respect reasonable and proper requisitions for the extradition of fugitives. But where facts are brought to the notice of the governor of a State, where he is informed in advance, that such a condition exists, that such a condition of public excitement prevails that it is practical assassination to turn the accused over to the authorities of another State for trial, then the governor is not only justified, but, in my humble opinion, it is his duty to deny the requisition.

Mr. McDERMOTT. I beg to suggest this to the gentleman: That even if it was demonstrated to the governor of a State that if the man for whose return requisition had been issued would be so tried that his trial would amount to absolute assassination, nevertheless the governor of the State upon whom the requisition was made would have no right under our form of government and under the Federal Constitution to consider the question of method of procedure or probable result of trial.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is fortunate that the gentleman is not the governor of any State.

Mr. McDERMOTT. I challenge the gentleman to find a writer on political economy in this country, I challenge the gentleman to find a writer on our constitutions, Federal or State, who will support the proposition by one single sentence that any governor is allowed to consider what kind of a trial a man will have if he is returned to the State where he is indicted. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, if a leader of a mob in a State should apply to the governor of a sister State for the custody of a man that he might be tried by Judge Lynch, be tried by a frenzied mob, the gentleman will not pretend that it is the duty of the governor of that State to surrender a fugitive under those circumstances. If the governor of the State is convinced that public sentiment is in such a pitch of excitement that while the court may preserve the form and procedure of law it is moved by the spirit of the mob, I say that the governor is justified in refusing that requisition upon principles of common humanity.

Mr. McDERMOTT. If the governor is regulated by the Constitution, if he is regulated by law, no governor has the right to make any such determination as the gentleman has suggested.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I hope the gentleman will respect the rules of debate and not undertake to make a speech in the time assigned to me.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided squarely that the governor of a State can not be compelled to grant a requisition made by the governor of a sister State, that the question is discretionary with the governor whether he grants it or not.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question about what he says, frankly, about the courts. I want his judgment upon this, as to whether Governor Taylor could not trust the court from 1900 to 1903, during which time the Republican party had control of the court of appeals, the court of last resort.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I most assuredly say so. I firmly believe it. The governors of Indiana, both Governor Mount and Governor Durbin, entertained that belief. Subsequent developments have vindicated their judgment. There were three trials of Caleb Powers. I do not think that the result of a single one of the trials is entitled to the respect of fair-minded men in this country.

Mr. JAMES. Does he not believe that his statement is unfair, if not entirely unjust, an injustice piled upon four of the most distinguished Republicans that are in his party in Kentucky?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I assume the gentleman to be a lawyer, and he knows that while certain questions can be presented to the Kentucky court of appeals, I presume that court is organized like the courts of final resort in other States. As a rule, questions of fact are not reviewable there on appeal.

Mr. JAMES. If the court was of the opinion that the trial was an unfair one and one that is an assault upon this man, or that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence or was an outrage, your party, who were in majority in that court, would have the right to have the case remanded back to the court below, saying that it was an unfair trial, that there was not evidence to justify the verdict, and instructing the county attorney to dismiss the case.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The court of appeals reversed two of the judgments convicting Powers because he was not fairly tried.

Mr. JAMES. Not for the reasons that you have suggested.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. For the reason that they were not fair trials and were not an honest administration of justice.

Mr. JAMES. Not at all. Out of 875 exceptions taken on the trial only three were sustained by the Republican court and in a vote of 4 to 3 from that bench.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The reversals must have been for material errors at the trial that prevented the defendant from receiving justice. Pending the appeals the judge who presided at the trials was making a canvass of the State for a seat in the United States Senate, chiefly on the ground that he had sent Powers to the penitentiary for the murder of Goebel.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman this question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do you consider that that opinion of the court of appeals reversing that case is such evidence of inability to get justice in that State as to warrant the governor of Indiana in disregarding the requisition?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not by any manner of means. I am not complaining of the conduct of the court of appeals, but of the conduct of the local court, composed of Judge Cantrill and a Goebel jury.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman's own statement shows the court of appeals reviewed the case and reversed it because there had been, as the gentleman says, not a fair trial, but what was in fact not a trial of——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would not make any difference, Mr. Chairman, if the court of appeals had affirmed the judgment. I do not believe any fair-minded man in the country can truthfully say that the three successive trials of Caleb Powers were fair and honest trials. It was a political prosecution brought on by political adversaries——

Mr. SHERLEY. I claim to be a fair and——

Mr. CRUMPACKER (continuing). And under the control of a man who was making a canvass for the United States Senate on the ground that he was engaged in convicting the assassins of William Goebel.

Mr. SHERLEY. I claim to be a fair and honest man and I am willing to stand on the floor of the House of Representatives and say to the gentleman from Indiana that there has not been a man convicted of the murder of William Goebel who, in my humble judgment, both as a citizen and a lawyer, is not guilty of that offense. That is the opinion of the best lawyers and the best men of the State of Kentucky. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman may have the benefit of his statement and he is entitled to anything he can get out of it.

Mr. BREAZEALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield to the amiable gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAZEALE. I thank you. Just now you stated your belief was that a packed jury convicted these people. Have you any evidence upon which you base that belief or is it merely an impression from loose-jointed statements in newspapers?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have been trying to state, if the gentleman pleases, the reasons for my opinion——

Mr. BREAZEALE. I know——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Take this one proposition: A county where the political parties are nearly evenly divided has a political trial of absorbing interest and the jury is made up altogether of men of adverse politics to the defendant. Would it not excite a suspicion at least that the action of the jury had been forestalled?

Mr. BREAZEALE. I admit you are justified in the suspicion, but is that evidence; is that serious testimony of packing a jury, but a mere inference and suspicion which you might have?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, that is one suspicion; we do not rest our case on one suspicion alone, but upon a dozen circumstances, and upon testimony of honest Kentucky Democrats, which I said a moment ago I will submit, if I am permitted to print it in the RECORD.

Mr. BREAZEALE. Is that testimony or mere opinion and suspicion?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is the honest opinion of men who were well acquainted with conditions.

Mr. BREAZEALE. An honest opinion, but not evidence.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. BREAZEALE. It is not a serious statement of facts upon which you can base a statement that——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the technical refining of the gentleman from Louisiana is too unsubstantial for practical purposes. We have the prominent facts that Taylor was fairly elected governor; that his political adversaries ousted him from that office and had him indicted for the assassination of Goebel, along with the secretary of state and others; that the secretary of state was tried three times before juries made up of men who were his bitter political adversaries; that they convicted him and the court of appeals reversed the judgment; they convicted him again and the court of appeals again reversed the judgment; they convicted him a third time, and for a third time the case is pending before the court of appeals of the State awaiting a decision.

Mr. BREAZEALE. Now, may I ask the gentleman one more question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. These are some of the facts upon which my opinion is founded.

Mr. BREAZEALE. Is not flight a very strong suspicion of guilt?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It depends upon the circumstances. It is evidence of good sense and prudence on the part of those who were charged with the assassination of Mr. Goebel.

If Mr. Powers had pursued that policy he would have stood a better chance for his life than he does to-day. I have known him for fifteen years. He was educated in the town in which I live, graduating from Valparaiso College, and no one in that community was more respected or stood higher as a student or a citizen than he. We do not believe he is guilty of the crime for which he was convicted.

Mr. JAMES. Does the gentleman know from what college Guiteau graduated?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not.

Mr. JAMES. The fact that a man graduated from a college, then, is no evidence that he is not a criminal. Now, the gentleman seeks to justify the governor of Indiana in refusing to honor the requisition of the governor of Kentucky by the results of the Caleb Powers trial. Was not the requisition refused before Caleb Powers had ever been tried; and how is it that he knew in advance how the trial would be conducted?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, Governor Mount was a man of accurate and reliable instincts. [Laughter.] He was well informed as to the local conditions surrounding the court, and subsequent developments show that he made no mistake. He knew what he was doing. Governor Mount refused the requisition. The voters of the State of Indiana in the election of 1900 fully approved of the action of Governor Mount, and they will stand by Governor Durbin as long as conditions remain as they now are.

Mr. JAMES. Did the same instinct prompt Taylor to issue a pardon to Caleb Powers before he had ever been charged or tried? [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Conditions sometimes, when political questions greatly agitate the public mind, are such as to take away all sense of fairness and justice from an otherwise honest and upright people. During the recent trial of the lieutenant-governor of South Carolina for what appeared to be an unprovoked murder a witness on behalf of the State was asked on cross-examination if he had not voted for a Republican candidate for Congress. Objection was made to the question. It was urged on the ground that it tended to impeach the credibility of the witness; and the presiding judge, after mature consideration, admitted the question, stating that the jury had a right to take into consideration the fact that the witness had voted for a Republican candidate for Congress as bearing upon his credibility. [Laughter.]

That is in the record in the Tillman case. It may be that conditions down in South Carolina are such as to justify that ruling of the court. I am not complaining about the result of that trial, but I am complaining about the results of trials in the State of Kentucky. I admit, sir, that as a rule it is the duty of governors of the several States to assist in the extradition of fugitives from justice. It is necessary that there may be a proper administration of the criminal laws of the country; but where life and liberty are involved and a condition of public excitement exists in a State such that the courts are unable to conduct fair and impartial trials, it is the solemn and humane duty of a governor to refuse a requisition from that State until reason has resumed its sway and the excitement has abated.

That the discretion of the chief executive officer can not be controlled is a corollary of the old doctrine of States rights. You can not compel the chief executive officer of a State to exercise a discretion this way or that without controlling or embarrassing the administration of State affairs. That is Democratic doctrine. Now, Mr. Chairman, Governor Durbin was elected to the high office he now occupies by a majority of nearly 30,000 of the voters of the State of Indiana. My recollection is that in the State platform in the campaign of 1900 the Republicans of Indiana indorsed unqualifiedly the administration of Governor Mount, including his refusal to surrender Governor Taylor to the Kentucky authorities under the then existing circumstances. Governor Durbin has the reputation in Indiana and throughout this country of being not only a law-abiding but a vigilant law-enforcing governor. As chief magistrate he has used the power at his command to arrest and disperse mob after mob in the State of Indiana. In my judgment, he has done more in enforcing the criminal laws of the State and protecting life and property against violence and lawlessness than any other governor that has honored the position he occupies since the days of the great Morton.

Governor Mount refused the first requisition, and he was prompted in his action in some degree by the sincere belief that Taylor had been lawfully elected governor of the State of Kentucky; that he had been ousted from the office by the high-handed and revolutionary proceedings of his political adversaries, and that it would be a recognition of the validity of the contest to surrender the real governor of the State to the one who had unlawfully usurped his seat.

Besides this, before Governor Mount had had an opportunity to act upon the request of Governor Beckham, claiming to be the chief executive of the State of Kentucky, Governor Beckham had arbitrarily refused to recognize a requisition issued by Governor Mount for a fugitive then in the State of Kentucky. A number of days before the request was made upon Governor Mount to surrender Governor Taylor to the Kentucky authorities he made a requisition upon the governor of Kentucky for the arrest and surrender of Rudolph Gossman, a convict who was about to be released from the Frankfort Penitentiary and who was under indictment for a crime in Floyd County, in the State of Indiana. Beckham, in a letter that implied at least an insult to the governor of Indiana, responded to the requisition as follows:

Hon. JAMES H. MOUNT,
Governor of Indiana, Indianapolis, Ind.:

A requisition from you for the arrest of one Gossman, wanted in Floyd County, Ind., has been presented to me. I will gladly honor it if you will first assure me that any requisition issued by me as governor upon you will also be honored. This understanding is desired because of certain expressions attributed to you in the press.

J. C. W. BECKHAM,
Governor of Kentucky.

Upon receipt of this letter from Governor Beckham, Governor Mount wrote him declining to enter into any bargain or compact respecting the question of extradition of criminals between the two States, but insisted that it was the duty of a governor to decide the merits of each application when it was presented to him for action. Governor Mount's letter I will now read:

Hon. J. C. W. BECKHAM, Frankfort, Ky.:

Replying to your telegram of the 3d instant, I can not enter into any compact or agreement that shall become binding. This would be an unwarranted departure from executive practice and the law. I must reserve the right to determine each requisition on its merits.

JAMES H. MOUNT,
Governor of Indiana.

In the face of this record, Mr. Chairman, what have gentlemen to say respecting the conduct of the acting governor of the State of Kentucky in arbitrarily refusing to honor a requisition by the governor of the State of Indiana for a fugitive criminal? The action of Governor Beckham was based entirely, as he says, upon gossip. He had not as yet called upon Governor Mount to surrender the alleged fugitive, but before he would surrender a fugitive from justice from the State of Indiana upon the requisition of the governor of that State, in order that he might be tried under an indictment regularly returned, he insisted upon a bargain that the governor of Indiana would in the future when called upon honor requisitions from the governor of Kentucky, which agreement the governor of Indiana properly and in a dignified way refused to make. Was Governor Beckham justified in refusing to respect the request of the State of Indiana for the surrender of Gossman? Did he violate the Constitution of the United States and the fundamental ethics between the States in so acting? When Governor Mount subsequently refused to surrender Governor Taylor to the Kentucky authorities he had before him this recent precedent of the governor of the State of Kentucky.

Governor Durbin simply followed the precedent set by his lamented and highly respected predecessor, but before final action he took pains to fully inform himself respecting the real situation surrounding the court in which the indictment against Governor Taylor was pending. He ascertained to his own satisfaction that such a condition of excitement existed and such an intense political hatred against Governor Taylor pervaded the functionaries in control of the administration of justice there that it would be impossible for him to have a fair and impartial trial. He spent much time in making the investigation and reached the conclusion I have stated. I will let him state in his own way the grounds upon which he refused to honor the requisition of the governor of the State of Kentucky. Here is what he said:

For the second time requisitions have been presented to the governor of this Commonwealth, issued by your authority, asking for the extradition of William S. Taylor and Charles Finley, alleged fugitives from justice from the State of Kentucky, and at this time residing in the State of Indiana. The indictment presented charges these men with being accessories before the fact to the willful murder of William Goebel. I respectfully decline to honor the requisitions.

The reasons given for a similar action on the part of my predecessor, the lamented ex-Governor Mount, still obtain in a pertinent manner as a basis for this refusal, reinforced as they are by events that have occurred since that time, which only tend to establish the conviction to those who believe in equal and exact justice under the law to all men that the time has not yet arrived within the environments of this prosecution whereby an unprejudiced and nonpartisan hearing of a trial could be had. I choose to make use of the right and the duty of the executive of the Commonwealth to exercise a discretionary power of refusal to the end that the purposes of persecution, which seems to be the conspicuous feature of this prosecution, may not force these men before a court partisan to the very extreme of vindictiveness and a jury organized for conviction in its personnel and impanelment.

The assassination of the late William Goebel was a monstrous crime, deplored, as I believe, by every citizen of Indiana and of the Republic. The spirit of assassination is the twin of anarchy. If allowed to go unpunished there could be no more serious crime than that a citizen of a State, or the official representative of the Commonwealth in any capacity, should be foully murdered as the result of conspiracy or as an individual act.

I have given careful and conscientious consideration to the evidence produced in the case already heard of the persons accused of complicity in the murder of William Goebel so far as has been placed in my hands by the attorneys for the prosecution, and I unhesitatingly affirm that conviction based upon such a mass of self-evident perjury reflects the poisoned passions of a court and jury and strengthens the belief that were these requisitions honored I would be only aiding the determination of the prosecution to convict these men without any reference to law, justice, or fact.

I can not cause a man, from whom the presumption of innocence should never be stripped except by legal methods, to be subjected to the rapine of political persecution. Kentucky is a Commonwealth revered for its high sense of justice and honor. It has given to the jurisprudence of the country some of the ablest lawyers of the nation; it has honorable representation on the Supreme Bench; it is the birthplace of Abraham Lincoln, the embodiment of justice, who dedicated his life to securing the rights of all men under the law. It is a State wherein, very generally, justice has been signally exemplified in the practice and purposes of courts, and this honorable record only emphasizes in conspicuous comparison the odious acts which in the trial court of Judge Cantrill have been permitted in the name of law where the life and liberty of citizens are at stake. Can a fair trial be had for these men under indictment? What was the object in appropriating $100,000 for the conviction of the suspected murderers of William Goebel? Does not the evidence demonstrate that a portion of this sum has been paid for perjury? In the recent trial of Caleb Powers why should judicial proprieties have been outraged by the refusal of Judge Cantrill to give a change of venue from his hearing? Why should a jury of twelve partisans of the late Mr. Goebel be selected to try the cause at bar?

In striking contrast to the ultra partisanship of the Kentucky judge and jury, I recall an example of the profound sense of justice that characterized a case, largely political in its character, that came before the Federal court in Indianapolis shortly after the war, when party spirit was at its zenith. The Democratic treasurer of Jennings County was on trial. General Harrison appeared for the prosecution and ex-Governor Hendricks for the defense. The regular panel of jurymen was in the box. Judge Walter Q. Gresham was on the bench. Mr. Hendricks first appealed to the court for a political poll of the jury, and then for a special jury to be composed of an equal number from the Democratic and Republican parties. He made a most earnest and eloquent plea that justice to his client and the political character of the case demanded that the jury should be evenly divided between the two leading political parties, and no advantage be given over his client by the insidious influences of a preponderating partisan bias in the jury. Judge Gresham, an ardent Republican, very promptly granted the request, and a new jury was impaneled as asked for by Mr. Hendricks. Compare this act of justice, based on the proposition that no political prejudice or advantage should enter into the jury box, with the record of the court and jury in the cases that have so far had a hearing in the trials of the alleged murderers of Mr. Goebel.

On this subject Thomas Jefferson wrote: "An officer who is intrusted by the law with the sacred duty of naming judges of life and death for his fellow-citizens, and who selects them from among his political and party friends, ought never to have in his power a second abuse of that tremendous magnitude."

Does not the action of the court of appeals of Kentucky, in its reversal of the initial convictions in Judge Cantrill's court, emphasize the contention of the governor of this Commonwealth that these men sought to be extradited can not secure a fair and just hearing? Judge Cantrill, candidate for a United States Senatorship, instructed a jury that it might convict on the testimony of one alleged accomplice if that testimony was corroborated by that of another alleged accomplice; that it might convict the defendant for the act of another man, to which the defendant had never agreed, and which was not the necessary or probable consequence of anything to which the defendant had agreed. It is remarkable that the trial court compelled the defendant to answer the prosecutor's questions in relation to other crimes than the one for which he was on trial, and then, over protests, permitted the specially employed attorney for the prosecution to make an impassioned plea to the jury to hang the defendant on accusations entirely outside of the record. To such perversion of justice I will not consent to consign any citizen of this Commonwealth, be his residence temporary or permanent.

The monstrous rulings and instructions of the court, with its vicious partisanship further represented by a jury unanimously made up of Goebel Democrats, is of itself sufficient cause for a refusal of your request; but, added to this, I have on file letters and protests from many representative Democrats of your State, prominent in the organization of the party, and from editors of Democratic newspapers, universally condemning the persecution in the Goebel trials as a travesty upon justice, and urging that no requisitions be honored for Mr. Taylor and Mr. Finley until reason has resumed sway and the good name of Kentucky, in its procedure under the law in its courts, be restored.

I had hoped the trial of Caleb Powers, just concluded, would demonstrate that the efforts of the prosecution were really to determine who the murderers of Mr. Goebel were in a way that would convince the people of the country of a sincere determination to this end; that the jury would be selected for its integrity rather than its partisanship; that the court would remember its obligations as a judge rather than its aspirations for a Senatorship; that the rules of evidence having universal recognition in all the States of the Republic would be followed in this latest trial, especially in view of the reversal of the court of appeals in the former trials. It is a deep disappointment that the utter disregard of justice which marked the previous trial was as notorious in the second trial of Powers as in the first. Consequently I can only voice my condemnation thereof by refusing to honor your requisition, which, in effect, would make me a party to the conviction and punishment of two reputable citizens of Indiana.

When better assurances of a fair and impartial trial of Messrs. Taylor and Finley shall be given by the trial of those now in Kentucky under indictment for participation in the assassination of Mr. Goebel, and the record of the procedure shall show that an impartial judge sat on the bench and nonpartisan jurors filled the box, your requisitions will be honored. Until the time comes that justice is meted out to those now under the jurisdiction of the courts of Kentucky a requisition leading to such a travesty upon justice as the last trial of Caleb Powers presented will not be honored by the surrender of citizens of Indiana by any official act of mine.

Governor Durbin has the confidence and respect of all right-thinking people throughout this great country. He is one of the most vigilant and active in enforcing law and order and in protecting rights of all the chief executives throughout the country. He has often effectively used the power at his command for the purpose of suppressing mobs and preventing outrageous exhibitions of frenzy on the part of lawless gatherings. In one instance not a great while ago when a judge of one of the courts of general jurisdiction in the State of Indiana ordered a man accused of crime brought before him for an early hearing, in order to appease a sentiment of vengeance on the part of the people in that community, the governor forbade his trial at that time upon the ground that the public mind in that locality was excited to such a pitch of frenzy that the accused could not have a fair and impartial trial. Did he reflect upon the people of the State of Indiana in that action? He did a brave and noble thing, and the people throughout the country applauded him for it. He is against mob law and mob violence in all its forms, and he has no more respect for the convictions of a court that is prompted by the spirit of a mob than he has for the unauthorized action of a lawless gathering of infuriated citizens.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman to say that Governor Durbin was elected upon a platform that made the protection of Taylor and Finley a political issue. Am I correct in that?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My recollection is that the State platform approved the conduct of Goverment Mount in refusing the requisition.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That, of course then, did make it an issue?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. To that extent?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, it did to that extent. What of it?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I just wanted to know. I was asking for information.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. This much of it——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The action of Governor Durbin rests upon the facts; and, in my opinion, when history comes to write up this lamentable affair in truth and soberness, it will find an abundance of facts to justify that extraordinary proceeding under the extraordinary circumstances and conditions that prevailed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman has asked, "What of it?" If you will permit me, I will tell him.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I asked the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH], "What of it?"

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the gentleman will permit me, I will answer his question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It will take the gentleman too long. I do not care to yield so much time.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. It will not take the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] any longer than it will me, and if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] will not permit the gentleman from Mississippi to answer I will answer myself, and say in answer to the gentleman's question, "What of it?" that it was the gentleman's party in Indiana that made this fact a political issue and not the Democrats in Kentucky. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] will yield I will very gladly answer the questions of his colleague [Mr. HEMENWAY]. But if he is not willing that I should have fair time in which to answer those questions, then I suggest that he conclude and let his colleague from Indiana and myself fight the question out upon the floor. I am willing to fight this question from start to finish. I think I am reasonably familiar with the case and I am fairly deliberate about these matters.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I had about concluded my remarks, and there will be an abundance of time for gentlemen on both sides of the House to discuss this question further.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman tempts me to say that the assumption made by his colleague [Mr. HEMENWAY] in his questions to me are without foundation; and there I rest until there shall be a fair opportunity for me to be heard.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My colleague is able to take care of himself.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We understand that the facts substantially as stated by him are true.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] admits in his remarks that there was great excitement in the Kentucky elections over this question. That is the proposition that I have been undertaking to demonstrate in the interrupted course of my speech—that the public mind in the State of Kentucky was at such a pitch of excitement and that feeling was so intense that it was impossible for the men who were accused of responsibility for the assassination of Goebel to have a fair trial. That Powers did not have a fair trial I believe is admitted by every fair-minded man in the country who understands the situation.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I must protest that the gentleman from Indiana is misstating my proposition. I did not say that there was any "extraordinary excitement." I said the leaders of the Republican party injected that issue into the campaign.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman said that Caleb Powers's speech before the jury was the platform upon which the election in the State of Kentucky was settled.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is substantially what I said, and I stand by it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. On that admission I am willing to base my assumption that no trial of those accused of Goebel's murder before a packed partisan jury could be fair or honest. I am insisting that Governor Durbin under the circumstances was justified in doing what he did. I concede it to have been an extraordinary thing, but the circumstances were extraordinary. His action was necessary to protect a citizen from conviction by the frenzy of the people without regard to his guilt or innocence, and it was justified by every dictate of justice and humanity.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman a question at that point. If justice was so decidedly upon the side of Messrs. Taylor, Powers, Finley and company, how does the gentleman explain the fact that the southern people of Kentucky, when the question was submitted to them—how does the gentleman explain the fact that the people returned such an overwhelming verdict against Mr. Powers?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There are many things about Kentucky elections I have never been able to explain. They seem to be utterly inexplainable from any fair and rational standpoint.

Mr. KEHOE. Before the gentleman from Indiana closes, will he yield to me for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. KEHOE. The gentleman has stated what he thought of the action of Judge Cantrill as the judge presiding at the trial when Powers was convicted. Does not the gentleman know that the death sentence imposed upon Caleb Powers was the result of a trial presided over by Judge Robbins, one of the cleanest judges that ever sat in a court of justice?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know the judge personally. I only know that at the last trial there was not a political friend of Powers on the jury; there was no real Republican on that jury. The evidence shows that there was a Goebel Republican, a friend of Goebel who had his picture hanging in his home—he was the only Republican. I do not care who the judge was; the jury that brought in the verdict determined the question of the guilt or innocence of Powers—not the judge. I do not know whether the judge had any control over the machinery for the selection of jurymen; but if he had, and if he was eminently fair as the gentleman claims, he ought to have said, as Judge Gresham once said when presiding at a political trial in Indiana, that in cases of that kind juries should be made up of men of opposite politics; and for that reason Judge Gresham set aside an entire panel and sent the United States marshal into the country to get a new panel, composed of men of both parties, in order that the case might be decided upon its merits and not by partisan prejudice. Such conduct was demanded, not only for appearances, but for the sake of fairness and decency in the administration of justice.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I should like to say a word to the gentleman from Indiana. He seems to be bewildered because of the make-up of juries in Kentucky, and can not understand it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is a bewildering proposition.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I can explain it to the gentleman. Nineteen out of twenty of the juries are of the same complexion as in these murder trials, because three-fourths of the Republican party in those counties are negroes and three-fourths of the remainder are illiterate whites and incompetent to sit on juries.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Ah, that statement will not do. I have extracts from papers published in Scott and adjoining counties, calling attention to the fact that the jury commissioners and the sheriff in summoning jurors went by household after household because they were Republicans, and summoned men on the other side.

Mr. TRIMBLE. That is not a fact.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have affidavits that were made and submitted at the time of the trial proving that fact; I have extracts from papers published in that locality calling attention to the fact that there were thirteen hundred white Republican voters in Scott County, or in the county where the jury were summoned at the time, and that they were men of average intelligence and respectability—that they measured up to the common standard in the county.

No amount of assertion, no amount of sophistry will convince the American people that it was possible for those accused of the assassination of Mr. Goebel to be tried fairly when the jury commissioners filled the jury box with names so that the jury drawn for the trial must be composed entirely of Democrats. It is contrary to human nature to expect a fair and impartial result of such a case before such a tribunal, and the trials of Caleb Powers were travesties upon justice and are not entitled to the respect of any justice-loving citizen.

The court of appeals was composed of four Republicans and three Democrats prior to the last election, and in both appeals from the convictions in the Powers cases the judgments were reversed upon a party division of that high court. The men composing that court were, without doubt, men of high character and ability, but political prejudice growing out of the Goebel affair so permeated the public mind in the State of Kentucky that no one was free from its virus. When the supreme court of the State in both instances decided the case according to the party majority of its members, it is too much to expect that an ordinary jury would rise above partisanship and try the cases according to the law and evidence.

The packing of the juries in those cases with political enemies of the accused was an outrage against justice that can never be forgiven.

I make no criticism of the State of Kentucky or any other State, North or South, in relation to the administration of justice as a general proposition. I have no doubt that the sense of fairness and right in the State of Kentucky is as high and pure as it is in the State of Indiana, but I am sufficiently well acquainted with human nature and with the operations of political prejudices in times of intense excitement to know that a jury made up exclusively of one party or the other could not possibly do justice between the State and the accused, even if it were disposed to try to do so. If the jury had been composed entirely of Republicans, who is there that will say that there would have been a conviction, regardless of what the evidence might have proven? Human nature in Kentucky, I assume, is about the same as it is in Indiana. To try a person for his life and send him to the gallows by courts and juries organized and surrounded as the courts and juries were that tried Caleb Powers the last time is practically judicial assassination. Is the governor of a State bound to surrender an alleged fugitive to be tried under such conditions, knowing at the same time that he will have no chance whatever for a fair trial? Would his conscience be easy at any time afterwards?

I regret greatly the necessity for saying these things about the administration of justice in the State of Kentucky under the extraordinary conditions that surround the Goebel trials. The debate was not of my seeking. It was precipitated upon the House by the impassioned and vitriolic denunciation of the honored and respected governor of the State of Indiana by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I will not remain in my seat and permit the name and standing of my State and her distinguished governor to be unjustly attacked and vilified without offering a word in resentment. I sincerely hope that in the future elections will be conducted with such fairness in all of the States of the country that unfortunate conditions like those existing in Kentucky after the election in 1899 will never again occur. I have now finished my remarks. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Editorial from Lexington (Ky.) Leader, August, 1900.]

FARCE AND TRAGEDY.

The curtain was rung down on the third act of a legal farce—or, rather, tragedy—entitled "An attempt to hang Taylor and damn the Republican party."

Act No. 1 introduced Thomas Corruption-fund Campbell and his satellites, Dee Armstrong, George Russell, and Thomas B. Cromwell, in their well-known specialty of discovering a man with a motive for bringing about the death of Senator Goebel and perjured testimony to give color to the charge.

The second act was an alleged examining trial presided over by that able jurist, "Old Dan Moore."

The third, and, at present, the last act in a prearranged conviction under the forms of law concluded Saturday afternoon, when twelve men brought in a verdict of guilty and fixed the punishment of Caleb Powers at confinement in the penitentiary for life.

Judge Cantrill said at Frankfort, when an application for a change of venue was made, that under the conditions then surrounding that city he would not try a sheep-killing dog there. Franklin County has reason to congratulate itself that the infamous trial was transferred to Scott County, and that the latter bailiwick furnished the twelve men who were willing to bring in such a shocking verdict.

There was not one iota of testimony, perjured or otherwise, that connected Caleb Powers with the assassination of Senator Goebel. He admitted bringing the mountain men to Frankfort, and proved conclusively that they were not there for murder, but for the purpose of showing the interest that was felt all over that part of the State in the contest then being heard by the legislative contest committees. They came for the lawful purpose of petitioning the legislature to stop the contests and permit those who had been legally elected to fill out their terms as State officials. They did petition the legislature, and when their prayer was refused they quietly went back home. Had they desired to kill the Democratic members, as testified to by Culton, Noaks, and Golden, there was nothing to prevent them doing so. But not one word was said that contemplated violence of any kind.

At every conference that Caleb Powers attended where violence was suggested he put a stop to it. He even went so far as to say: "I have more at stake than any of you, and before I will permit any such action to be taken I will give up my contest, resign my office, and go home."

Yet this is the manly man that has been convicted under the "forms of law" as an "accessory before the fact" to the murder of William Goebel. It was just such a trial as this, resulting in a miscarriage of justice under the "forms of law," that induced an outraged public to burn the court-house at Cincinnati, and but for his fleetness of foot and successful evasion T. C. Campbell's ashes might have mingled with those of the temple of justice that he had disgraced.

This outrageous farce is the natural result of Goebelism. A partisan sheriff, partisan jurymen, selected because their minds were already made up, and ironclad instructions almost demanding the sacrifice of Caleb Powers.

Caleb Powers was tried before a judge who made stump speeches from the bench, a judge who did not speak to two and possibly three of the attorneys for the defense, and who vented his spleen on one of them by fining him twice for an alleged contempt of court that was continuously indulged in by the lawyers for the Commonwealth without comment from the court, a judge who, after four arguments had been made for each side, changed the instructions for fear some loophole had been left by which the defendant might escape.

And this is "justice" in the proud old Commonwealth. God save the mark! Might makes right and the weakest go to the wall. Let us destroy our court-houses, throw away our law books, relegate our court officials to the cornfield or the penitentiary, and hang our heads in shame before our sister States.

Partisan venom has done its work well, and unless the higher courts reverse this decision the liberty of this young man, innocent as a babe unborn, must be sacrificed to the demand of men who are unworthy to loose the latchets of his shoes.

A free people have stood and will continue to suffer grievous wrongs for a long time in silence, but the turning point will sometime be reached. For the present, however, an appeal to our courts is a useless waste of time and a gang of usurpers and bloodsuckers, responsible to nobody, occupies the high places in our State government.

[Editorial in Louisville Dispatch.]

AN INFAMOUS VERDICT.

The Dispatch will not question the integrity of Judge Cantrill. We will not say that he is dishonest or that he willfully exerted his influence to secure a conviction, regardless of evidence. We must conclude that he is merely a man of narrow views and bitter partisan prejudice. We must conclude that he is so narrow-minded as to be intellectually incapable of understanding the grave responsibility of his position, and so blinded by prejudice that he was unable to see but one side of the case. We must conclude that he went upon the bench thoroughly convinced that Powers is guilty and equally convinced that it was his solemn duty to the State to exert all of the power of his position, regardless of precedent and rules of evidence, to secure a conviction. Otherwise we would feel it to be our duty to denounce his conduct as infamous.

As the Dispatch can not question the integrity of the court, we must also concede the intelligence and honesty of at least a majority of the jurors. To suspicious minds it may appear somewhat singular that a jury in a case in which six weeks had been consumed in hearing evidence and argument, and in which there was much conflicting testimony, could have reached a verdict in twenty minutes. It may seem strange to some, too, that a jury to whom the evidence of guilt appeared so overwhelming should have fixed the punishment at life imprisonment instead of death. We will not point out that Powers, if guilty, is guilty of one of the foulest crimes in all the history of civilized nations, and if deserving of punishment at all should receive the extreme penalty of the law. We merely attribute this peculiar feature of the verdict to the unaccountable idiosyncrasies of the human intellect. Surrounded by people demanding a conviction, and confronted with language and rulings and instructions from the bench showing so plainly the desire and purpose of the presiding judge, a refusal to convict would have been contempt of court.

In the presence of this verdict the solicitude of good citizens is for the Commonwealth of Kentucky rather than for the one man condemned. Free institutions are on trial. In no other American State has popular government met the fierce assaults it has encountered in Kentucky within the last eighteen months.

Nowhere else in this broad land do the storms of passion and prejudice rage so furiously. This verdict shows to what extreme men of intelligence and fairness and integrity can be driven in the rancor and excitement of political strife. It reveals to us the weakest side of human nature and points out to us wherein the danger to our institutions is greatest. It may serve to arouse the minds and consciences of the people.

[Editorial, Lexington (Ky.) Leader.]

In October, 1900, after Caleb Powers had been convicted for the first time, and while an appeal was pending which it was universally believed would result in a second trial, Judge Cantrill appointed three Goebel Democrats as jury commissioners of Scott County, where Powers was tried, to fill the jury wheel for the three 1901 terms of the Cantrill court in that county.

The three Goebelite commissioners put about 300 names into the wheel, and, as every name has since been drawn out for jury service, it is easy to figure out the political complexion of the original wheel from the records of the court.

Of the 300 names put into the wheel, out of which it was known Caleb Powers's jury must be drawn in the event of a second trial, all but 5 turned out to have been those of partisan Goebel Democrats. Of the 5 "black sheep" whose names got into the box, 4 were Republicans and 1 an anti-Goebel Democrat. The names have all been drawn out in securing the Powers and other juries during the year, and are matters of record in Judge Cantrill's court.

Scott County polls about 2,200 Goebelite votes and 2,000 Republican and anti-Goebel Democratic votes. Leaving out of consideration, say, 200 independent Democrats and 700 negroes, there are easily 1,100 white Republicans and 2,200 Goebel Democrats in the county. On this basis a jury wheel of 300 names ought to contain the names of about 100 Republicans.

And now for the significance of the political preponderance of this Scott County jury wheel.

In criminal cases in Kentucky the prosecution is entitled to five peremptory challenges without explanation or cause. Therefore, if by some unaccountable and almost impossible freak of chance every anti-Goebel name in the jury wheel had been drawn out during the impaneling of the Powers jury, and not one of them had been excused for disqualifying cause, it would have been in the power of the prosecution to peremptorily challenge every one of the five and still insure a solidly Democratic jury.

In taking the names from the wheel for jury service the lone anti-Goebel Democrat was drawn for the February term of court; one of the Republicans was drawn for the May term, and the remaining three Republican names came out during the October term in drawing the Powers jury. Two of these were excused for cause, the third was peremptorily challenged by the prosecution, and Caleb Powers was left to the mercy of twelve partisan Goebel Democrats.

This is a mathematical demonstration of partisanship under "forms of law" that illustrates the methods by which Caleb Powers was a second time convicted by a "jury of his peers."

[From the Louisville Evening Post. By C. N. Buck.]

GEORGETOWN, Ky., August 7.

Two affidavits were filed yesterday by the defense in the trial of Caleb Powers for alleged complicity in the murder of William Goebel, in support of their motion for the discharge of the venire summoned by the Scott County deputies on the ground that the venire was overwhelmingly Democratic, only two out of ninety-five men being Republicans.

The first affidavit was that of Thomas C. Whaley, of Bourbon County, and is as follows:

"The affiant, Thomas C. Whaley, states that he is a citizen and resident of Bourbon County, Ky., and has resided therein all his life, and is intimately acquainted with the citizens of said county.

"He states that he has examined the list of the special venire summoned by Will Rogers, deputy sheriff of Scott County, Ky., and that there are ninety-five names among the special venire, and are as follows:

"J. S. Munson, George W. Allison, George Thompson, Ed Turner, Charles Penn, J. M. Craig, S. D. Thompson, John W. Thompson, B. F. Hazelwood, John Ba. Frank Hazelwood, C. N. Hostetter, John F. Clark, W. F. Heathman, G. Fry, J. F. McDonald, Leslie Hagan, F. P. White, W. E. Stillwell, William Doty, George Wyatt, Clark Bennett, Newton Current, Dennis Handley, Junius Bolson, Walter Clark, Jesse Berry, John Cain, J. Walker Muir, B. B. Wood, L. J. Mitchell, Tom Redmon, R. E. Letton, H. Miller, M. J. Glenn, A. B. Denees, H. D. Campbell, R. L. Collins, Clay Estis, William Neal, Albert Mitchell, Frank Clay, L. T. Beal, S. J. Kennedy, Charles Barnett, Malcum Boswell, Charles Stevens, A. T. Wright, Varden Stipp, James Earlywine, G. W. Redmond, Robert Stipp, L. D. Harris, Cass Goff, Ed Burk, John Endicott, Andie Riffett, J. C. Morris, Alfred Bitterton, A. P. Adair, George Estes, Scott Williams, Jeff Kiser, Joel Howard, John Wilson, Charles Wilson, Tom Estes, H. C. Roberts, George Tate, Jack Higgins, John Daughty, George Peddicord, Tom Paggett, Nath. Goodman, Newell Snapp, George Faulconer, Frank Shanks, John Conway, S. P. Oliver, Ora Jones, Jim Fisher, Thomas Current, Mote Rankins, Jack Cunningham, Woodson Browig, Berry Bedford, R. O. Turner, John Johnson, F. B. Thomas, D. T. Wilson, Steel Mars, E. T. Keller, J. H. Haggard, Lloyd Ashurst, W. A. Hill, jr.

"And out of the entire list of names summoned as above set out there appears only the names of two Republicans. The remaining ninety-three venire men are all Democrats.

"Affiant further says that the aforesaid deputy sheriffs, Will Rogers and Z. D. Lusby, were accompanied when they summoned said special venire by Jim Burk, deputy sheriff of Bourbon County, Ky., and Joe Williams, constable of Bourbon County, Ky.; that said Burk is an ardent Democrat and supporter of the late William Goebel, as is Joe Williams.

"The affiant further says that, in summoning the said special venire, that in the city of Paris and on the Millersburg pike said Lusby and Rogers, or one of them, accompanied by said Burk and Williams, or one of them, passed and failed to summon James Powers; then summoned John Cain; and then purposely failed to summon Dan Isgrigg, George Leeds, Porter Jett, Thomas Whaley, all of whom were Republicans, and Dr. T. J. McMillan, independent Democrat, who were qualified for jury service; summoned Walter Clark, Ed Burk, Dennie Handley, Caswell Goff, Democrats, and adherents and admirers of the late William Goebel. He says that the above-named Republicans that were passed by by said sheriff were all competent and qualified jurors, and that they lived in said city and on the turnpike roadside where the aforesaid Democrats resided.

"He says that on the Maysville and Lexington and Clintonville pikes that said Rogers and Lusby, or one of them, accompanied by said Burk and Williams, or one of them, passed Henry Power, independent Democrat, and George Pepper, W. P. Fox, C. T. Throckmorton, George Taylor, George Jones, H. C. Weathers, Letcher Weathers, Republicans, and summoned Ben Woods, W. F. Heathman, J. F. McDonald, Leslie Haggin, George W. Allison, J. W. Muir, J. M. Craig, and Ed Turner, all of whom are Democrats and adherents and admirers of the late William Goebel. He says that each of the above-mentioned Republicans are competent and qualified jurors, and that they reside along that portion of the said Maysville and Lexington and Clintonville turnpikes on which the aforesaid Democrats reside that were summoned.

"He states that on the Jackstown pike that said Rogers and Lusby, or one of them, accompanied by said Burk and Williams, or one of them, passed and purposely failed to summon A. J. Gorey, Lee Devers, and Joe Booth, Republicans, and summoned only George Redmond, Bedford Devers, Albert Mitchell, William Neil, and Robert Collins, Democrats, and adherents and admirers of the late William Goebel. He states that each of the aforesaid Republicans passed on said Jackstown pike are competent and qualified jurors; that they reside on that portion of said road where said Democrats reside.

"He says that on the North Middletown and Flat Rock turnpikes that said Rogers and Lusby, or one of them, accompanied by said Burk and Williams, or one of them, passed W. C. Massie, C. J. Daniel, and —— Burns, all of whom are Republicans and competent and qualified jurors, and summoned G. W. Wyatt, John J. Redmond, R. E. Letton, and M. J. Glenn, Democrats, and adherents and partisans of the late William Goebel. He says that the aforementioned Republicans reside on that part of North Middletown and Flat Rock turnpikes that the aforementioned Democrats reside on.

"He states that in the town of Ruddles Mills, and on the Millersburg and Ruddles Mill pike, that said Rogers and Lusby, or one of them, accompanied by said Burk and Williams, or one of them, passed John Hamilton, Independent Democrat; William Cherry and C. L. Hough, Republicans, all of whom are competent and qualified jurors, and summoned Thomas Current, James Fisher, Mort. Rankins, Tom Paggett, George Falconer, S. R. Oliver, John W. Conway, and Nathan Goodman, Democrats, and adherents and partisans of the late William Goebel. He says that the aforesaid Republicans reside in the said town of Ruddles Mills and on that portion of Millersburg and Ruddles Mill turnpike roadside where the aforesaid Democrats that were summoned reside.

"He says that said Rogers and Lusby, or one of them, accompanied by said Burk and Williams, or one of them, in the vicinity of Clays Crossroads and the territory included by the Clay and Kiser pikes and the Georgetown and Cynthiana pikes, they passed and purposely failed to summons J. M. Hughes, J. Miller Ward, Catsby Woodford, John B. Kennedy, Frank P. Clay, sr., Frank P. Clay, jr., O. P. Clay, Quincy Ward, Col. E. F. Clay, E. F. Clay, jr., Joseph H. Ewalt, Independent Democrats, and Henry Clay, Lan Hume, Morin Moore, Spears Moore, Republicans, and summoned A. P. Adair, Alfred Batterton, and John C. Morris, Democrats, and adherents and partisans of the late William Goebel."

The other affidavit was that of Caleb Powers, the defendant, which follows:

POWERS'S AFFIDAVIT.

"The defendant, Caleb Powers, now comes and enters this challenge to the panel of jurors and each juror tendered him, and moves that said panel and each juror thereof and the special venire summoned from Bourbon County be discharged upon the following grounds, to wit:

"That the officers of this court directed to summon the special venire from Bourbon County, by order of this court, entered in this cause, August 5, 1903, and who were sent by the sheriff of this county to perform said service, did not impartially perform their duties, and did not and have not fairly and impartially selected said jurors, but, upon the contrary, did illegally and in violation of the statutes and constitution of this Commonwealth, and in violation of the rights secured to this defendant as a citizen of Kentucky and as a citizen of the United States, under and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, and particularly in violation of the rights secured to him by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, select and summon all jurors, and the said officers did consciously and purposely select jurors of a different affiliation from the political affiliation of the defendant, and this they did with the purpose of discriminating against the rights of the defendant, and with the intention to deprive the defendant, who is a citizen of Kentucky and of the United States, of the right to a fair and impartial trial by a jury impartially selected, as required by the laws and constitution of Kentucky and the Constitution of the United States and the amendments thereto.

"The defendant further moves the court, for the reasons and upon the grounds hereinbefore stated and set forth, to require the sheriff to designate other officers than those by him directed to summon the special venire aforesaid, to summon petit jurors for the trial of this cause, and that such persons so designated for such service receive all proper admonition and instruction from this court in respect to the performance of their duties. And if the court is unable to grant this motion as indicated, the defendant, for the reasons and grounds stated, moves the court to designate some other officer or person other than the sheriff to summon jurors in this cause.

"The defendant tenders herewith his affidavit."

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi ten minutes, or such time as he desires.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the closing sentence of the speech just made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] was a reiteration of the charge that the juries in these cases were "packed" by the conduct of the officers in selecting those juries. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is very easy to make loose assertions. This was a law case. There were astute and shrewd lawyers on both sides. That very point was made. That very point was reviewable by the court of appeals, consisting of a majority of Republicans, and they, upon the evidence and not upon newspaper reports nor upon "well-confirmed opinion," as the gentleman states his position now to be, decided that that charge did not hold water.

Now, Mr. Chairman, politics is one thing, Americanism is another thing, and there ought to be a calm and cool consideration of a grave question like this.

Winding its way through the country to the Mississippi River runs the narrow thread of the Beautiful River, as the Indians called it. On one side are the people of Indiana, on the other side are the people of Kentucky; of the same parentage, the same language, reading the same literature, subject to the same law, with the same American traditions, with the same American ideals. And yet to-day every sentence in the gentleman's speech is a quiet assumption that upon the left side of that river the men who constitute juries, who, blood of the blood and bone of the bone, are identical with the men upon the right side of that river, and the men who compose the courts on the left bank of that river are necessarily corrupt, and rotten, and perjured—having taken oath to do their duty—and that upon the other side of the river there exists but one man who beforehand, when not one word of evidence had been heard, was competent, simply because he was an Indianian and a Republican, to decide that this state of corruption did, or rather would, exist. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, in some respects—and I say it in all kindness—the speech made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is a disgrace to American civilization and to American politics. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There has been too much of this quiet oozing out of this arrogant assumption of superiority upon one side of that river and inferiority upon the other. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Upon the forum, upon the battlefield, upon the bench, in literature, and everywhere they have been your equals, if not your superiors. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen, one Edmund Burke, long years ago said that he did not know how to draw an indictment against a whole people; but the gentleman from Indiana can teach the great English statesman how to draw it, and how to draw it by innuendo and from newspaper reports.

Mr. Chairman, suppose that that courteous gentleman, William McKinley, had been assassinated in a State where, by the chances of politics, there had come to be a majority of socialists, with a socialist governor, and suppose that that socialist governor had declined to surrender his murderer upon a requisition on the ground that he would be surrendered to the tender mercies of the anti-anarchists?

This thing can not stop here. I believe it is the duty of every governor of every State in this Union to refuse, from this time on until the error is corrected or apologized for, a requisition from the governor of the State of Indiana. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When William McKinley was struck down there was not a Democratic mother in a household in this broad land that did not feel weighed down by sorrow. There was not a Democrat anywhere that did not feel it. In my own little town we held our meeting, and when I spoke to my people about it tears were in the eyes of a great many of them. The gentleman has gone a little bit further. He has at least admitted Goebel's foul assassination, his political assassination—and I honor his integrity when he declines to answer in the negative my question when I asked him if he did not know it was a political assassination.

He now admits that Goebel is dead and buried and that he has been assassinated, and further that he was assassinated for political purposes. The gentleman neglects to admit that the shot that killed him was fired with smokeless powder from the window of the office of the secretary of state. The gentleman neglected to mention that immediately upon the perpetration of the crime the Republican governor of the State of Kentucky, who is now a fugitive from justice in Indiana, ordered the military to keep the civil officers from searching the premises in order to find the criminal. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman has failed to mention the fact that the man who was assumed to be guilty by the evidence of his colleagues, the man that probably perpetrated the offense, or who was supposed to have employed him who did it, was granted a pardon either the day before or immediately after the murder, but that he was granted a pardon either before the murder was committed or else immediately after and before he was suspected or public opinion had pointed its finger at any man.

Mr. BOWIE. Was he not caught with a pardon in his pocket when he was running away?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The man was arrested with the pardon in his pocket, issued before it was known that he was suspected; if not before the fatal shot was fired, certainly before he had been accused.

A MEMBER. And had $1,300 in his pocket also.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman forgets that this man, who is now a fugitive from justice from Kentucky, whose people are as honest and brave as are the people of Indiana—that this man who is now a fugitive from justice fled before there was any trial or indictment, and that the governor of Indiana must have assumed that there was not going to be a fair trial. The assumption runs through the gentleman's speech that, in the trial of a man who happens to assassinate a Democratic governor in the State of Kentucky it is necessarily a political question which is being tried and not a plain murder case. When the gentleman was asked the question he admitted that in the nomination of the last governor of Indiana a plank was put in applauding and approving the conduct of Governor Mount in refusing to honor a requisition from a State of this Union, notwithstanding the positive constitutional provision which says that "full credence" shall be given to the courts and procedures of other States. The gentleman admitted that in answer to a question, said that was true, and added, "What of it?" I will tell him "what of it." This of it: It means that the Republican party in Indiana has sunk to a level of partisan rancor so low that they confess that the refusal to honor a requisition for a murderer—aye, a murderer, a foul assassin—of a Democratic governor of Kentucky is a political question in Indiana. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman says that 30,000 people in Indiana approved that, and yet there is no man here who does not know that they voted the Republican ticket for other reasons and not for that reason. But in the adjoining Commonwealth, with as brave men and with as sweet home-keeping women as the world ever knew, the people decided that question as a direct issue, and decided by an equally large majority that, in their opinion, it was assassination, a political assassination, and yet more, that the political assassin, convicted, ought not to be pardoned, and that his colleagues in crime ought to be returned to the State of Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Just a word or two more.

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield to the gentleman such time as he desires.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Just a word. I want to say this in closing, Mr. Chairman. I am on political issues a partisan, but I am not rancorously or otherwise a partisan personally. I am not now and never have been. My personal feelings do not enter into my politics and my politics do not enter into my personal relations. I say that we have come to a strange state of things in these United States of America when to protect a foul assassin who stands charged to answer for that crime the governor of a State has failed to do his duty in honoring the requisition of a sister State, and even defends him by making as an argument the reply that there was "bad politics" in the adjoining State, and when indictments grow out of it justify the failure to surrender the alleged criminal on the ground that murder is a political question. The Republican governor of the adjoining State pretends to feel justified in refusing to obey the spirit of the constitutional mandate which gives "full credence" to the courts and procedure of the adjoining State on such a pretext.

My God, Mr. Chairman, if we have got to a point where men must be assumed to be corrupt, capable of bribery, capable of subornation, capable of assassination through the process of the courts, because they are Democrats, or because they are Republicans, or because they are Populists, or because they are Kentuckians—and the gentleman has given no other reason—then it would be infinitely better for us to dissolve this Republic of coequal sister States, founded upon mutual respect and mutual credence, and to elect or in somehow or other to manage to give the power to some great and good man who could manage the country in a fatherly way. [Applause.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? How does the gentleman explain the fact that in the three trials of Caleb Powers the juries were made up in every instance almost unanimously of ardent political friends of the late Goebel—Goebel Democrats?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I explain it by simply saying the gentleman is misinformed as to the facts. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In the very first trial of that case—I do not know about these matters in detail—but in the very first trial of that case there were six Goebel Democrats, four anti-Goebel Democrats, and two Republicans, one of whom the gentleman from Indiana says was a Goebel Republican, about which I know nothing.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me ask the gentleman another question. If I am correct, then, in my facts, the gentleman will admit that the indictment that I have made against the State of Kentucky in this particular instance and for this particular occasion is well founded?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Ah!

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And I will not admit it for a reason that is patent and obvious to all men. Whoever asked the politics of the men who sat upon the jury which tried the assassin of William McKinley? I do not know yet whether they were all Republicans or all Democrats. It was not a case of politics, it was a case of murder; and if the gentleman came into the State of Mississippi, let us say, where men are not allowed to serve upon a jury unless they can read and write and calculate simple addition and multiplication and interest—those are the requisites upon which we impanel jurors there—he will find juries every day trying the case of a Republican suitor upon which there would not be a single Republican. It is not a political question, and the gentleman's question assumes that each of the twelve men who are summoned and sworn upon the jury to try a case of murder, according to the law and the evidence, are corrupt and are going to try it not upon the law and the evidence, but upon the politics of the case. The assumption is not only not well taken, but it is unjust to any part of the American people, whether in Kentucky or Indiana, and I for one am not prepared to believe that such a state of absolute degeneracy like that exists anywhere.

Mr. BOWIE. May I ask the gentleman a question? Is it not true that the offense for which Mr. Goebel was assassinated was because he exercised the constitutional right of contest in the manner provided by the Constitution, a right which has been exercised without question in the House of Representatives hundreds of times since this Government was founded?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Not only that—not only was it the crime of taking a contested-election case to a tribunal provided by the laws of Kentucky for it, but it is furthermore true that in a majority of the States of this Union, in a great many of them at any rate, that very same tribunal—to wit, the legislature of the State—is provided for exactly that same sort of contested-election case. The gentleman might just as well say that because the gentleman from Missouri, or some other gentleman upon the Democratic side, was turned out of the House of Representatives by a committee a majority of whom were Republicans, and in his opinion was unjustly turned out, and because he was swollen with resentment by means of it had assassinated the chairman of the Committee on Contested Elections or the contestant, that that ought to be pleaded in extenuation of murder.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. POU. I would like to inquire of the gentleman, inasmuch as platforms are made generally to get votes, if he knows of any other State in the Union where either political party has sunk so low as to put a plank in its platform for the purpose of getting votes which assumes that jurors and judges of the highest courts in a sister State have committed perjury in advance of the trial in the court?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The answer to that question is so obvious that it needs no answer. Of course I do not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Did not the gentleman say that it was—no, it was the gentleman who preceded him—that in the State of Kentucky that was the issue?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That was not the issue.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman referred to something that I said.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman did not say so. The gentleman did not understand the question. The question of the gentleman from North Carolina was this: Whether I knew of any State that had made a political question out of the refusal beforehand of the governor to give credence to a court in a sister State, on the assumption on the part of that governor that the population of the sister State was degraded, and that its jurors and judges, therefore—for it could only be therefore—were corrupt; and to that I answered, "No." In Kentucky your own party attempted to make an issue of the prosecution of the murderers, and the Democracy met the issue because your people made it first in the very State where it occurred. You went down before it like grain before the sickle, and they are going down forever regardless of the political questions in Kentucky as long as they dare flaunt their banner of assassination and murder as a political issue. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] propounded some questions to me a short time ago which I did not at that time have an opportunity to answer, but I will now undertake to answer in as plain, frank, and candid a manner as I am able. I am reasonably familiar, I think, Mr. Chairman, with the entire Goebel matter, if it may be designated as such. I have never been inclined to trespass upon the time of this House for the purpose of settling that question here, because I have thought that the people of Kentucky—Democrats, Republicans, Populists, and Prohibitionists—are fully competent to settle all phases of the matter in the proper forums of that great Commonwealth.

But, Mr. Chairman, since the matter is before the House, I desire to say, in response to the questions of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], that in the campaign of 1899 the Republican party was represented at every precinct in that State, so far as I know, by two members on the precinct election board. That was the law then and had been for very many years before that in Kentucky. The precinct officers conducted the election, counted the votes at the close of the polls, and certified the same to the county board, which in turn ascertained the result in the entire county by adding the votes as certified by the precinct boards. The county board certified the result in the county to the State board.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, did I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to say that there were Prohibitionists in Kentucky?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Oh, yes, a good many of them. If it will be any satisfaction to the gentleman, I will say to him that nearly two-thirds of the territory of Kentucky is under prohibition. We make liquor down there not so much for ourselves as for the people of other States, such as Maine and Kansas. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I take up the next question suggested by the gentleman, which was that the State canvassing board had issued a certificate of election to Governor Taylor and his colleagues on the Republican ticket.

It is true that we have a canvassing board, made up of three members, whose duties are merely mechanical—that is, to add up the returns from the various counties, ascertain who upon the face of the returns have received a majority of the votes cast, and issue certificates of election to them. That is what happened in this case. On the State election board of Kentucky, in 1899, there were W. S. Pryor, ex-chief justice of the State; W. T. Ellis, for three terms a Member of this House, and C. B. Poyntz, of the city of Maysville. These gentlemen stand as high and possess as excellent moral characters as any men in Kentucky or elsewhere.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I agree with the gentleman that they were conscientious, straight, honorable men, and issued the right kind of a certificate.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Let me answer further that this board was asked to question the validity of a large number of ballots in certain counties when the matter came before them, but upon a full consideration they determined that their functions were solely to cast up the votes that had been certified to them by various county boards and issue certificates to those prima facie entitled thereto.

So I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, it is in every State in this Union, that there is what we call a canvassing board to ascertain who upon the face of the returns is entitled to a certificate, and that there is also a board for contest purposes, if a contest is desired by any party to the election.

Now, in Kentucky we have had from time immemorial a provision in our State constitution requiring the contest for governor and lieutenant-governor to be tried by the State legislature. I know that nearly all States in the Union have similar provisions, either in their constitutions or statutes. There may be some States that do not recognize the right of contest, but Kentuckians are too just, honorable, and intelligent to tolerate a system under which fraud and corruption could not be eliminated in the ascertainment of even the commonest right of one of her citizens.

Therefore, any man who was a candidate for governor or lieutenant-governor may go before the general assembly and contest the right of him to whom the certificate of election has been awarded. I don't know whether our sister State of Indiana has any provision for contest or not. I apprehend from the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that he does not believe that a man ought to have the right to contest the election of another to an office.

If that is his view, all well and good. I do not participate in any such opinion myself. I believe that when a man is wronged in a political race there ought to be a tribunal before whom he can seek redress. Now, then, coming to the prosecution of Powers and others, I want to say that in my humble judgment the men who have been charged with and tried for the assassination of William Goebel have had as fair and impartial trials as any men or set of men ever charged with crime in any State in the Union.

Powers was indicted in Franklin County and took a change of venue to Scott County. The first and second juries were selected from the latter, and the third from Bourbon County. The first trial jury was made up of four anti-Goebel Democrats, two straight Republicans, and six straight Democrats, and returned a verdict of guilty within an hour's time, or thereabouts. On the third jury there was one straight Republican, and no verdict can be returned in such cases except by unanimous agreement, so that one juror can prevent the conviction of an innocent man as easily as eleven.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] extend my time?

Mr. DINSMORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I desire to say to this House and to the country that on the second jury that tried him Caleb Powers had an old schoolmate and boyhood friend; and you, gentlemen, understand better than I can describe the strong attachment that binds one schoolmate to another. Any man who declares that the magnanimous, the generous-hearted Kentuckian could be induced by political prejudice to inflict the verdict of death or life imprisonment upon one whom he had loved and cherished as his schoolmate in past years does not understand Kentucky character, does not understand Kentucky manhood, and does not appreciate the strength, the force, the breadth, and depth of Kentucky friendship.

I believe, sir, that that schoolmate of Caleb Powers, Democratic in politics as he was, would sooner have suffered his good right arm to be stricken from his body than to have rendered a verdict against that man had not the evidence shown his guilt beyond doubt.

But now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to answer further a point suggested by the gentleman from Indiana and which I was about to overlook. He referred to the fact that there had been a great reward fund offered by the Commonwealth of Kentucky for the arrest and conviction of the assassin of William Goebel. I desire to say to him, in answer to that, that out of the hundred thousand dollars reward offered less than $8,000 has ever been used in the prosecution of these cases, and a considerable part of that—as I understand, though I do not personally assert it to be a fact—has been used in procuring and bringing to court the witnesses for these defendants themselves.

The gentleman asked me something about Mr. Campbell, intimating that I was associated with Mr. Campbell——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I did not mean to refer to the gentleman personally, but only to his party.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand the gentleman meant nothing personal. To speak plainly and candidly, I am informed that Mr. Campbell was employed by the brothers of the deceased William Goebel and looked to them wholly and entirely for his compensation in the case.

Mr. JAMES. Allow me to ask the gentleman whether it is not true that Mr. Campbell, the gentleman who was employed by the Goebel brothers to prosecute these murderers, was a Republican and was an elector at large for the State of Ohio on the electoral ticket eight years ago?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is my information, that he was in politics a Republican, and that he was an elector at large for that State at the time mentioned by my colleague.

Mr. BOWIE. Allow me to ask whether there was a single anarchist on the jury that tried Czolgosz for the murder of President McKinley?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not suppose there was; at least I hope there was not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in these matters I am one of those who do not desire to see any innocent man suffer. If I know myself aright, I would be as far from convicting William S. Taylor or Charles Finley or Caleb Powers, if I did not believe them to be guilty, as any man within the Union.

Mr. JAMES. Will my friend tell the House whether or not there was a single witness of Democratic faith and belief who testified to a single material fact against Caleb Powers—whether it is not true that every material fact that was proved against Caleb Powers was proved by Republicans and those who voted for William S. Taylor for governor?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I was coming to that proposition. It is a fact that the men who have been convicted of the assassination of Mr. Goebel were found guilty upon the testimony of Republicans almost exclusively.

Not only were they Republicans, but active and, many of them, office-holding Republicans under the late Republican administration of Kentucky.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not true that William O. Bradley, ex-governor of the State of Kentucky, testified in the trial of Captain Ripley—a captain of a military company brought there by Taylor—that Ripley was in authority upon the statehouse grounds during the trouble, and Ripley told him that Taylor said to him, "Goebel has but twenty-four hours to live," and Goebel was murdered in less than twenty-four from that time?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is a fact that Governor Bradley testified to on the trial of Ripley.

Mr. BOWIE. Is it not a fact that there was nobody in the statehouse except Republicans at the time the murder was committed?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Well, I am not able to speak about that from personal knowledge, but from all accounts it is true that the Republicans had charge of the statehouse at the time Goebel was assassinated. That is conceded by everybody.

It is true by Republican testimony that Goebel was killed by a shot fired from the window of the office of Caleb Powers, secretary of state. It is true by the testimony of Republican witnesses that Governor Taylor was within 40 feet of where the assassin sat when the bullet was fired. It is true that immediately after the shot was fired he called the State guard, or his militia, and surrounded the statehouse, and refused to permit any civil officer to enter to make search for the assassin.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if it is not true that Caleb Powers said to Youtsey, who had been convicted of being a conspirator in causing Goebel's death, that he wanted Youtsey to give him a written statement that he might have it used by sending it to a Republican judge who was considering his case, saying in that written statement that he was not guilty of the murder of Goebel, and if Youtsey did not say to him, "I refuse to sign such a statement; you know you were guilty;" and that Powers said, "Well, if you will give me that statement I will pledge you that I will return it to you;" and that Youtsey did give him that statement, and that it was used, upon whom we are not informed, and that he returned it to Youtsey and Youtsey sent it to his wife in a registered letter, and when Youtsey made his confession he produced that document signed by Powers agreeing in that document that if Youtsey would do that it should not be used for any other purpose, and that was brought out upon the trial, that paper signed by Powers himself?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is correct.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I wanted to ask if it was true that the average juror in Kentucky, when the jury is composed wholly of Democrats, is as calm and cool and impartial and unprejudiced as the members of the Kentucky delegation on this floor seem to me to-day?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not understand, as a matter of fact, and taking the gentleman's question in entire seriousness, when he did not mean it so—I do not understand that the common rank and file of people ever feel such intense interest in politics as those of us who are upon the active scene. That is the answer I have to make to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman must bear in mind that the State of Indiana is on trial now, not Kentucky; that we are the defendants, and that we are put on trial without the usual notice.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. You have had four years' notice. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Kentucky has been knocking at your door for four years, asking for the surrender of these fugitives.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This is my question: In view of the fact that there was such a conclusive case against the defendant, and the evidence furnished against the men to be prosecuted by Republicans, would it not have been good policy to put one or two Republicans upon the jury, just for appearance's sake?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. They were on it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If you had a safe case, why would it not have been wise to do that?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman, not content with Republican evidence, wants Republican juries.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Put half and half, say.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to say to gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber that I would not absolutely have been afraid to have rested this case on trial with twelve good Republicans from any State in this Union. I say to you, gentlemen, I thoroughly believe that the evidence was so strong that it would have been impossible for twelve men—it would have been impossible for any one out of twelve even—in any State of this Union that wanted to see the enforcement of law and criminals punished to have refrained from finding a verdict of guilty under the evidence.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If there had been half a dozen, there would not have been any such question as we are now considering. General Durbin would have recognized the requisition.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. We have had Republicans on the jury, and it takes every man upon the jury to find the accused guilty. We have had two Republicans and four anti-Goebel Democrats on the jury, and they found Powers guilty, and one Republican (you say one Goebel Republican, and if we had twelve, I doubt not you would say the whole twelve were Goebel Republicans) and eleven Democrats, and they found him guilty.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana, as to the trial of Youtsey, if it is not true when Youtsey was tried that every Republican paper in Kentucky and all their orators upon the stump during the campaign which was then being conducted were asserting that we were trying a crazy man, and that Cantrell was a tyrant trying a crazy man; and afterwards, when Youtsey was tried and they found him guilty, and after that Youtsey had confessed and Youtsey's confession was used, they said that Youtsey was a liar? I would like to remind the gentleman of that fact.

Mr. BRICK. Was not Youtsey a liar?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I think that so far as his feigned insanity was concerned he lied. I do not think there is any falsity in Youtsey's confession.

Mr. THAYER. Was he an alleged Republican?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes; a Republican officeholder.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky what he thinks would have been the state of public opinion in this country if, after the rendition of the decision of the Electoral Commission in the Hayes and Tilden case, Mr. Hayes had been shot down in the State of Indiana by a Democrat, and he went into the State of Kentucky and a Democratic governor of Kentucky had refused to honor the requisition of the governor of Indiana?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That would have meant revolution in this country if Kentucky or any other State had refused to surrender an assassin of President Hayes after he had been declared to be President by the Electoral Commission. It would have meant revolution if the governor of any State in this Union had sought to protect the assassin of the lamented Abraham Lincoln.

It would have meant the same thing if the executive of any State of the Union had undertaken to protect the assassin of the lamented Garfield, and would have meant the same thing if any governor of any State of the Union had undertaken to protect the assassin of the late William McKinley. But why should we have one rule for the assassination of one man and a different rule for another?

A MEMBER. A Democrat.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That may be a sufficient justification for the distinction with some people; it is not with me. I believe in standing upon high ground. I believe that there ought to be some remedy, some supplemental provision for the return of fugitives from justice to the State in which they are accused, to cover such instances as that of Durbin and Taylor.

If it were conceded that Taylor and Finley were ever so innocent, they stand charged by the grand jury of Franklin County, Ky., with the high crime of complicity in the murder of William Goebel. The plain letter of the Constitution of the United States and the law enacted by Congress requires Durbin to surrender them, but he positively declines and thus defies the supreme law of the land.

Now, if he may refuse in this case, why may not the governor of any other State refuse in any other case? It will not do to say that there is politics in this thing. If there is politics in it, who brought politics in? Why, sir, William Goebel was assassinated to prevent him from serving as governor, and in the very first State Republican convention held in Kentucky after the assassination the party leaders of that State indorsed the course of William S. Taylor and his colleagues and brought the matter into politics in Kentucky.

As I said in answer to a question earlier in the day, the Republican leaders of Kentucky made the speech of Caleb Powers in his own defense, before the last jury which tried him, practically and substantially their campaign book in the last election. Whenever they have thrown down the gauntlet upon this proposition the brave and courageous Democrats of Kentucky have stood ready to accept the challenge, as they ever will.

We are ready, if it must be fought out before the people, as Democrats of Kentucky, believing in law, order, and tranquillity—a cheerful submission to the constituted authority—to fight it out before the plain people and let them return the verdict. If the verdict of a Scott County jury or a Bourbon County jury is not sufficient to convince, we are willing to submit it to the honest, just, and intelligent citizenship of Kentucky.

Now, then, I wish to say briefly in conclusion that in my judgment this Congress can do no wiser thing than to add a supplemental provision enabling the States from which a criminal or alleged criminal has fled to recover the fugitive and bring him to trial. Why, sir, if Mr. Taylor is brought back to Kentucky, I have no doubt he can get an entirely fair trial.

There was a time when he could have come back, had a trial, and if he had not received fair treatment in the lower court the majority of members on the supreme court of the State were his political friends who were able and competent to have protected him. Then why did he not return? He had said that he was not a criminal and he would not be a fugitive, but he turned out not only to be a fugitive but as clearly a criminal, and in that he is protected by the governor of a neighboring State.

Mr. BRICK. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes, sir; I will.

Mr. BRICK. Does the supreme court of Kentucky try the merits of a case upon the facts?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No, sir.

Mr. BRICK. Then how could the supreme court of Kentucky protect a man from a jury of a court below?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The supreme court of Kentucky has the authority when a case comes before it upon which there is not sufficient evidence to warrant a conviction to direct a dismissal of the indictment in the lower court. That is the authority and the jurisdiction of the court of appeals of Kentucky.

Mr. JAMES. And is not that held to be the law in the case?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. And was it not so held in the Caleb Powers case?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes, sir; a rule once made in a case is there, as it is elsewhere, held to be the law of the particular case, although in some other case it may have been held subsequently to have been unsound.

Mr. JAMES. That is right.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is the law. William Goebel was a brave and able advocate of popular rights as against corporate aggression, and no man in Kentucky was ever so hated by special interests or so loved by the plain people as he. But, in conclusion, let me ask Republicans, Can you personally or as a party afford to uphold the governor of Indiana in his course of lawlessness, his course of ignoring the provisions of the Federal Constitution? Can you afford as a great party in this country, which you are, to indorse the course of ex-Governor Mount and present Governor Durbin in ignoring the plainest mandate of the Federal Constitution?

Can you afford to take that position either as a party or as citizens of Indiana? Can you afford to take the chances of making your Commonwealth an asylum for criminals from every quarter of the globe? I believe the great masses of Indiana are too just, too mindful of the rights of a neighboring State to further tolerate the action of Governor Durbin. I shall be disappointed in my high ideals of Indiana citizenship if the public sentiment does not soon compel Governor Durbin and his party to do that which ought long ago to have been done—surrender Taylor. I thank the committee. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HEPBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 10421. An act to provide for the removal of snow and ice from the sidewalks of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

H. R. 8688. An act to transfer jurisdiction of reservation No. 32, in the city of Washington, D. C.;

H. R. 8686. An act to amend section 895 of the code of law for the District of Columbia; and

H. R. 4844. An act for the relief of Vincenzo Gerardi, of Washington, D. C.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the Senate concurrent resolution No. 4.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 10669) to regulate the issue of licenses for Turkish, Russian, or medicated baths in the District of Columbia.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HITT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY].

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to go into the merits of this Kentucky matter, but the gentlemen here—and I excuse them for having some feeling about the matter—believe that the man whom they seem to think was elected governor of Kentucky was assassinated, I do not believe anybody knows by whom. There was great excitement all over the State of Kentucky, and the Democratic party insists on continuing that excitement, on working themselves up to a high pitch, which I believe makes it unfair for the governor of Indiana to send ex-Governor Taylor down into Kentucky for trial.

I do not care whether it is in Kentucky, New York, Indiana, or Ohio, or any other State in the Union, crimes growing out of politics can not be divorced from politics, and when a trial comes off there is more or less of politics enter into it. I say it is a fact that the gentlemen on the other side were so excited I should dislike to be tried by them. Now, if I were charged with a crime I would be willing to have a jury made up of the Kentucky delegation, for I know I should be treated fairly; but I should not want to be tried for a political crime by such a jury. [Laughter.] I should rather be a Democrat if I were going to be tried in the State of Kentucky. But my friends on the other side feel very deeply about this matter.

Now, I put the question a while ago, "Has not Youtsey made more than one statement?" And the answer came back from several members of the Kentucky delegation, "No." They know he is a confessed liar. The people of the United States know it. Every man who has read the newspapers publishing the report of the Kentucky trials know that Youtsey is a confessed liar; that he lied over and over and over again. And yet they say that the only time he told the truth was when he said that Caleb Powers was guilty. I am free to confess that I do not know whether he is guilty or not. I only have the impression that I get from reading the newspapers.

Mr. KEHOE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; I can not yield.

Mr. KEHOE. Hasn't Taylor made more than one statement?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Possibly he has. I have not followed it very carefully. Now, in Indiana this has never been an issue. We never heard of it in the campaign. We indorsed the position of Governor Mount and Governor Durbin, and we believe it would not be right at this time, with the excitement that prevails, to send Taylor back to Kentucky for trial. I remember that I was in the governor's room when Mr. Goebel came there and wanted to argue the question with the governor, and did argue the question with him. And Governor Durbin received him with all courtesy.

I remember one of the questions the governor put to him was this: The governor had before him a list of the men elected as jurors in one county where Taylor was supposed to be tried if he was sent back. Every name on the list with the exception of two were Democrats. The governor had before him the statement of men of high character that he could rely upon, who informed him that these men were Democrats, and he put the question to Mr. Goebel, "Do you believe it is fair for me to send Taylor back to Kentucky to be tried by a jury composed of these men?" And Goebel answered, "Yes."

Now, you gentlemen upon that side, as well as upon this side, know that is not fair; you know that there could not be a fair trial in times of such political excitement, unless the jury were divided politically. In fact, there ought not to be any trial of a man charged with a political crime until the people have cooled off and can give him a fair trial. I sincerely hope, gentlemen, that some day in the future we will ascertain who killed Mr. Goebel, and that that man will be punished. I hope for the good name of Kentucky—and Kentucky has always borne a good name, and I hope she always will in the future—they will find out who killed Goebel, and that the man will be punished for killing him. I sincerely believe that if under the meager circumstantial evidence upon which Kentucky has convicted Powers, if the State allows him to hang, the time will come in the history of that State when everyone will regret it; when you will wish that you could tear one page out of your history.

Get away from your political prejudices and excitement; look at this as the people of the United States look at it—because you can go into any State other than Kentucky and Indiana and get the judgment of people of fair and even temper—and you will see that Governor Durbin is acting exactly right in keeping Taylor out of Kentucky until the political prejudices of the times have cooled off and he can have a fair trial.

As for Governor Durbin, he has no feeling in this matter one way or the other, except to see that Taylor when he does go back to Kentucky, gets a fair trial. When you get in such a state of mind that you can give him a fair trial, there will be no trouble in getting him out of Indiana. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HITT. I now yield to the gentleman from New York five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor not for the purpose of discussing the Kentucky case, but to call attention to what the gentleman from Kentucky who first addressed the committee said in the outset. He commenced by reading from the President's message in regard to bringing fugitives from justice to this country, and then went on to intimate that the President was guilty of hypocrisy in that utterance in his message because he did not ask Congress to do something with the States that were refusing to return fugitives from justice, and he spoke of the visit of Taylor to the State of New York and having a conference with Theodore Roosevelt, as governor of the State of New York, early in this trouble.

I don't know whether Governor Taylor ever saw Governor Roosevelt or not. I don't know what was the subject of their conversation any more than does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]; but it is evident, whatever it may have been, that Governor Taylor stayed only a couple of weeks, according to the gentleman's statement, in the State of New York.

Then the gentleman brought in the fact that Governor Odell the other day had refused to accede to a request of the governor of Missouri for the removal of one Ziegler, who was indicted for bribery in St. Louis, in the State of Missouri; and he might have mentioned, but he did not, that a few years ago some men in New York were indicted for conspiracy in the State of Texas, and their case was first brought, according to my recollection, before Governor Flower, a very excellent governor, although a Democrat, and Governor Flower found out that the men had never been to Texas, that they could not be fugitives from justice, because they had never been under the jurisdiction of the State of Texas, and consequently denied the requisition.

Mr. BOWIE. Well, that is where this case differs from the other

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, wait a moment. I am not talking about this case. The gentleman ought to keep cool and wait and permit me to make this statement.

Mr. BOWIE. I am cool. Go ahead.

Mr. PAYNE. And a little while afterwards a requisition was made upon a Republican governor with like results. I saw yesterday in the newspaper that the requisition had been made from Missouri upon Governor Odell for this man Ziegler, and that Governor Odell had denied it. The paper stated why, and doubtless, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] got his information from the newspaper as I did, he found that it was because the attorney-general had advised the governor that it was not proper to grant this requisition.

The attorney-general is Mr. Cuneen, a very eminent lawyer of the city of Buffalo, a Democrat all his life, nominated on the Democratic ticket last fall, indorsed by the Prohibitionists, and by the combined vote of the Democracy and the Prohibitionists elected attorney-general of the State. So that the general indictment of the Republican party and of the President and of Governor Odell falls in this connection. I never have known much about this Kentucky case or about the feeling down there, but if I were Governor Taylor, no matter how good a defense I might have, and was charged with the murder of Mr. Goebel, and it was proved that I was within 40 feet of where the shot was fired, because that was my place of duty in the statehouse, and when I heard the shot fired I ordered a company of militia to take possession of the building and not let any man out or in, I would not want to submit my case even to the Kentucky delegation, fair-minded as they are. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Or to any other tribunal.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Suppose he had been in his place of duty and said to the conspirators, having the militia already in arms, "You act first, and then I will call out the militia;" and suppose he had had that militia waiting there for an hour ready to respond to that order, whenever the shot was fired to take the life of that man, should he not be indicted for murder?

Mr. PAYNE. If any man said that to save his own skin, and went before that jury and swore it was true, and I knew it was absolutely false and so testified before that jury, still I will say I would not want to risk my life before a jury from Kentucky having the feeling of the gentlemen who sit on the other side of this Chamber.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Why does not Governor Taylor move around to some of the other States and test the pulse of some of the other executive officers? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. I am not Governor Taylor's counsel, and I could not tell the gentleman.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I think I will perform a very good office if I address the House on a subject that may serve as a sort of buffer between those who have been engaged in this excited debate, and restore the House to that state of equanimity in which it is generally found when I address it on this subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the older Members of this House are often accused of having a set speech which they annually inflict upon the patience of the Members. I am not guilty to the full extent of that charge, but there is a subject in which I have felt a very deep interest for many years and upon which I do address the House once in each Congress.

First, because some of the older Members may have forgotten the cogent and urgent reasons that I have advanced in its support and the newer Members have never heard of it at all.

The subject is one that has deeply interested the business community of our Republic, and the proposition I have urged has received their hearty support. They are on record upon the files of this House in every Congress for many successive years by petitions and bills for the reorganization of our consular service.

The amount of information that has been furnished by the business community on this subject has been vast. The latest expression from that portion of the citizens of the Republic has been through the National Board of Trade, which only a week ago assembled here in the capital of the nation, with business men from every State in the Union, representing nearly all the commercial bodies and boards of trade.

Propositions for legislation of this kind have been, as I have said, before this body for several sessions of different Congresses. This measure has often got so far as to be reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs and to be placed on the Calendar; but there it has gone to that fate which so often meets worthy measures, because there have been inscrutable differences that seemed impossible of reconciliation between the two different parties.

The principal basis that is sought in this reorganization is, first, the tenure of office; that consuls shall be kept in their offices so long as they improve in knowledge and fit themselves more fully for duty. But against this the political objection has arisen, and I may venture to say that as a fact the Democratic party absolutely refuses to give its sanction to this feature of the bill.

There are other points of diversion between the two parties; but so earnest and so fair are the advocates of this proposition, and so fully impressed are they with the necessity of some legislation in this regard, that they are now prepared to compromise on this legislation and to see whether we can not agree upon some measure which shall in part remedy the evils that now exist in this service.

I am casting no reflections on the personnel of our service. There are as good men of both political parties in our consular service as exist in that of any other country. But it is the law and the system which I attack; and so long as the existing system continues no real remedy can be reached in this most important department of our Government.

I have introduced to-day a bill which is the work of a national committee, of which Mr. Henry A. Garfield, the son of the late President, is the chairman, representing all the boards of trade and chambers of commerce of our country.

This committee was intrusted with the care of the legislation relating to this subject, and the bill which I filed to-day is the result of their labor. I met Mr. Garfield in Philadelphia last Saturday, and he placed this measure in my hands.

Much as I am interested in the bill which I have been agitating for so many years, I am very glad to abandon it when in the judgment of so many of my colleagues it is pronounced impossible to pass it. Therefore I am ready to fall back on this much smaller measure, which I hope will be a stepping stone and ultimately the foundation for placing the service on the conditions which we all desire.

My object in speaking to-day is to call attention to this bill. I hope every Member will read it. In doing so he will find that it is limited to two essentials relating to the service. The first is one which should, I think, appeal to the fairness of every man present.

It is that the service should be classified, the salaries more nearly equalized, and the compensation of all put on a fair footing. As the service now stands, the compensation is most unequal.

Some officers of the consular service make to-day I do not know how much, but certainly as much as $20,000 a year, while others are paid the magnificent compensation of $1,000 a year, a salary which in my judgment is a disgrace to a country so able as ours to pay to the men who represent it abroad.

It can easily be seen that it is impossible for any man to support himself, much less his family, on this salary and at the same time live in the condition which every representative of the United States—over whose door stands the shield of his country, and who, wherever he goes, is recognized as the official representative of his country, and who is expected to maintain that dignity—has a right to expect.

The object of classifying the service, then, is to equalize the salaries; to divide the officers into classes, officers of one class receiving one grade of compensation, the next lower class another grade of compensation, and so on down the list.

The second feature of this bill is that all the fees, official and unofficial, of these officers shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States, and in view of the relinquishment of the profits which have accrued to the members of the consular service, these officers shall receive this proposed increase.

This will remove the existing inequality; this will remove the temptation of the consuls to charge more than the legal rate; this will remove the annoyance that all travelers and all those who have business to do with foreign countries abroad have been subjected to; this will remove the temptation to false invoices or other frauds, and will at the same time tend to equalize the compensation of all the consuls.

Mr. SCUDDER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SCUDDER. Is it not true that the Democratic party has in substance—that is, that the Democratic members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs have in substance—offered to report a bill along the lines which the gentleman now suggests, that they have been willing to do so for several years past, and that the objection to the reorganization of the service such as the gentleman proposes has been entirely due to the fact that it would fasten upon the service the mossbacks and the barnacles now attached to it, and who are largely there, if not entirely there, as the result of the present system of appointments, which, of course, have been made under Republican Administrations?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I frankly admit the first part of the gentleman's statement. I could hardly be expected to admit the second half of the gentleman's statement. I have already stated that it is the system that I think is responsible for the present conditions and not a political party.

Mr. SCUDDER. But it is the system which has resulted in the appointment of men whom the gentleman himself concedes should not be in the service by the fact that he introduces a bill to reorganize the service.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I will answer the gentleman by stating that in my opening remarks I said I brought no charge against the personnel of the service. I think it is as good as is possible under the present political system of our country and under the law as it stands to-day.

Mr. SCUDDER. Will the gentleman yield for another question? As the law stands to-day, I ask him, is it not entirely within the province of the President to appoint the very best men, and only the best man to each place, and is there any excuse for the appointment of any bad men, if the President will rise above and superior to party considerations and appoint good men?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I will answer the gentleman by saying that I am trying to keep party politics out of this discussion, because I am trying to meet the views of the gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, and I do not want to drag in past history. I can only answer him in a way that I am loath to do.

He says he holds the present Administration responsible, because they ought to do better. I do not know how far back his political memory goes, but I remember the acts of Quincy, who struck off the heads of nearly all the service when the Democratic party came into power, to an extent that had never been done before, so much so that it was one of the things that reflected most seriously on that Administration.

That is the reason, I say, that under the present law and under our political system no Administration, be it Republican or Democratic, can rise superior to existing conditions. There is a political pressure that nobody can resist under our system. I stand here myself as earnest and honest an advocate as any man can be on this question.

It was brought home to me by personal experience in South America long before I came to Congress, and I have been working and writing and speaking and trying to legislate ever since for the improvement of this system; and yet I confess to the gentleman that on one occasion sufficient pressure was brought to bear upon myself, loth as I was, to force me to recommend a man who, in my judgment, was not fully equal to the service.

Under the present system you can not resist that pressure, and that is the reason that the people who are earnestly in favor of the improvement of the system want the law changed, so that that pressure can not be brought to bear. When that is done conditions will change.

Mr. SCUDDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. SCUDDER. I should like to say to the gentleman that he himself, if I understood him correctly, interjected a political atmosphere into this discussion by stating that on this side of the House we were opposed to a reorganization of the consular system. If I understood the latter remarks of the gentleman correctly, I think perhaps he would like to revise that statement in the early part of his speech.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. In reply to the gentleman, I stated as a fact, which I said was not political, that the Democratic members of our committee have absolutely refused to support a bill making a tenure of office for the consular service. That is a fact which I think the gentleman will not deny.

Mr. SCUDDER. I would ask the gentleman whether or not this tenure of office which he suggests is not a tenure which means the keeping in of the men who are now there, instead of opening the door to all who might wish to come in?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Under this bill, or rather under the bill that I would propose to the House, the door is open, irrespective of politics, to the men in the civil service, or to the applicants who are competent to enter that service.

Mr. SCUDDER. Is not that what we want to do?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Not that I am aware of. There have been modifications asked. I was referring to my own bill. This is not my bill. This bill comes from the national committee representing the business interests of the country.

Mr. SCUDDER. I would ask the gentleman if the Democrats offered to report a bill favoring the classification of the service and stop there, and thereby cure one of the evils of the present service, without fastening upon the service the mossbacks and the barnacles that are there now?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. The gentleman offered to support that kind of a bill; but answering him frankly, I myself am in favor of the bill we had before us at that time, and whose development continues, and I have not changed my opinion in a single degree. I have reinforced it in my remarks, and the gentleman has reinforced it also by his question.

Mr. SCUDDER. Will the gentleman yield to me for another question?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I can not yield any more. I have answered your point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HITT. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Now, Mr. Chairman, to conclude in a general way. This is a proposition that can not be stated in fifteen minutes, and scarcely in an hour, and go into the details and illustrate the evils that now exist in our system.

But I wish to impress upon the House the important relations that this branch of service bears to the commercial success of our country. We are entering upon a great era of commercial development, and it is absolutely essential that our merchants and manufacturers should have trained men able to gather the statistics of the nation, of the Government, that they can possibly have.

All the movements of our country to-day are toward commercial expansion. Everywhere we look before us the business people are alive. The Government is acting. The canal is to be built. Navigation laws are to be passed; other matters, all tending toward development of our trade. The State Department, by unusual wisdom and great foresight, has kept the door in the East open against all the machinations that have been placed there to keep us out.

I submit to any man engaged in business in this country the absolute necessity that you shall have accurate and reliable information from the men who are to gather it in foreign ports.

How can men gather statistics and give us information if as soon as they have become capable to fill the great places they occupy they are brought home and entire novices are sent out to fill their places?

How can a man gather information if he can not read the public documents and newspapers and the other statistics of the places to which he is accredited and report them to his Government?

Why, he may have all the energy of the American people, for which we are noted; he may have all the push and brightness of the American people; but if he is hampered, if he can not read the information that lies at his door, if he can not speak the language of the country to which he is accredited, if he can not gather the statistics in governmental reports and send them on to his country in our own language, how can you get your information, and how can it be accurate, how can it be reliable?

It is not but right that the brightest men in our country in this branch of our service should receive more attention. I wish to say further that this branch is unique in its character. There is no branch of the service equal to these employees and able to fill the places that have the character of the men in these positions.

We should have men that should represent us with dignity as well as with ability. We should have men in it where our country is visited by foreigners or by their own citizens that they should receive them courteously and attend to their wants.

We should have men everywhere that would uphold the standing of American gentlemen; that is the highest on earth, because it comes from instinct of heart and right; and we should have men who are able to and do fulfill this office in a way that should reflect credit upon our country.

Mr. Chairman, this bill will be a benefit to the country. I believe that every American citizen here who sits as a representative of those who are interested in this subject will support this measure.

This measure, as I say, is a compromise, one yielding the ground that your side of the Chamber demands, and yielding the best judgment of those who have this interest most at heart, for the cardinal point that we are carrying out, that we at last can take this one step toward the demands of the commercial, business, and manufacturing interests of our country in the great era of progress that is now prevailing, their representatives shall not be limited to our own shores, but shall extend to the uttermost parts of the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. As I do not see the gentleman to whom I expected to yield, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky on that side.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I was not surprised at the speech made a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]. I was amazed at the utterances of my genial friend the other Representative from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY].

To belittle, to traduce, to hold up in a feeble way to contumely and contempt a great part of this Union, for the simple reason that it happens to fall within a political division not his own and within the horoscope of his long-cherished and long-nourished hate, is enough for the gentleman from Indiana, without regard to the merits of the case. The gentleman does after his kind. There is not a crimson Magdalen in all this world who does believe there is virtue in her sister. There is not an unpunished thief who finds honesty in mankind, and there is not a blind partisan hater by profession and by political faith who finds virtue in those who oppose him.

Partisan measures, partisan strife, partisan denunciations are part and parcel of his political capital and his political life. I was amazed, however, to hear the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] assail, as he has done, my native State. We are told, Mr. Chairman, that we should keep cool, that we should be serene, that we should express no feeling of anger, no feeling of resentment, no feeling of pain when the mightiest man in all our Commonwealth falls at the hand of a secret assassin in the discharge of his duty. I thank God that neither a Democrat nor Republican until the day of Goebel's assassination ever knew what it was to keep cool, to be serene, to be untroubled in such a tragic hour.

What would that heartbroken crowd at Buffalo have thought if some one of the learned gentlemen on the other side had wrapped his mantle about him and turned away from the bleeding victim of Czolgosz and had said that this, forsooth, was a political crime; do not get excited. What would you have thought when Lincoln fell here in this capital, when all the land was anger and amazement, if some new disciple of this philosophy, that there is such a thing as a political crime, that murder has a political home and assassination a political refuge; what would you have thought if he had said, forsooth, that this man who slew the lamented Lincoln was his political foe and this was a political crime?

I deny that there is such a thing as political assassination. I deny that there is such a thing as political murder so far as my party is concerned. I deny that outside of the political confines of the State of Indiana there is to-day in any country, free or enslaved, under a presidency or under a despot, a single spot on earth where an assassin can find refuge because of the complexion, the political faith, of his hapless victim.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STANLEY. Why, certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did not this man upon whom you have delivered such a panegyric himself assassinate a man?

Mr. STANLEY. This man——

Mr. HEPBURN. I simply ask the fact.

Mr. STANLEY. I wish to answer you, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman answer me?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes, sir. I am answering you now. This man was as brave as Taylor is cowardly——

Mr. HEPBURN. Will you answer my question?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes, sir; and those who slew him as cowardly and false——

Mr. HEPBURN. Will you answer the question?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes, sir; I am answering you. He imbued his hand in the blood of his fellow-man, in defense of his person and in defense of his sacred honor, under the clear skies, in the presence of all men in the open street.

Mr. HEPBURN. And he found an asylum in Kentucky after he did it, did he not?

Mr. STANLEY. No, sir; he found a defense——

Mr. GOOCH. After he was shot.

Mr. STANLEY (continuing). He found a defense in the court which will give to Taylor a fair trial. No jury, however partisan, Democrat or Republican, from that day to this, has ever indicted him for this offense, and William Goebel himself wore upon his body the wound of a pistol bullet from the hand of the gamest man and the best shot in Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to make one suggestion in that connection. Did not Goebel in that case positively decline a pardon from the governor of Kentucky?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEHOE. A Republican governor?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No.

Mr. STANLEY. I wish to say to the gentleman from Iowa, because I know that he would not, unless he were grossly misinformed, here in this place, where his voice is to be heard in all the land, recognizing as I do his prominence and his power, he would not stoop in order to shield this man Taylor to belittle and besmear with a charge absolutely false the grave of Kentucky's honored dead. I wish to say to you, sir, that the man whom he assassinated first assailed him in character, first maligned him in the public print.

I saw that same William Goebel at Augusta stand mute but fearless under the taunts of this same man. He had persecuted him for years. He met him on the streets in Covington; he asked him if he had written an article containing statements reflecting upon him, and before Goebel could answer his assailant fired a shot, striking him in the side, which he carried to his death. Goebel then fired at his opponent. There were only two shots fired; and if you will tell me how a man can shoot another after he himself has been shot through the brain, then I will tell you how Sanford was assassinated by Goebel.

Sanford fell with a bullet in his brain—through the center of the forehead. Goebel was found afterwards, torn and bleeding by the bullet that had plowed its way around his body. You can not assassinate a man that way. There was no window there; there was no smokeless powder there; there was no Marlin rifle there; there was no fleeing there. He shot him in the city of Covington, where his (Goebel's) most powerful opponents were.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman my time.

Mr. HITT. I will yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman, did not Goebel stand trial by a Kentucky jury?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes. Now, I wish to say that the only Republican who ever was and who ever will be governor of my State would be the first to refute that charge, because he was the first to pass an encomium on the manliness of Goebel; the first to praise the justice of the offering of that reward of $100,000. I wish to say this to the gentleman and to this House, that there was never, until Goebel had been assassinated, in any party or any set of people, not even among his bitterest enemies, a living soul that dared to charge that he was an assassin.

The man he killed was as gallant and as brave a rebel officer as ever rode to the stars and bars. He was absolutely fearless; he was a crack shot, and it was thought that to stand before the fire of Sanford was certain death. Such was the man who determined to silence William Goebel and to remove him from the political arena. He stood the assaults of that man for years with patience, and at last, driven to the wall, acted absolutely in his own self-defense, and the best friends that Sanford has to-day, including a United States Senator from my own State, who went with the dead Sanford to his grave, was the first to admit, the first to recognize, and the first to praise the manliness and courage of William Goebel.

Assassination is comparatively unknown in central and western Kentucky. There may be a disregard, as some see it, for human life, but in Kentucky they look each other in the eye when they fire. In all my life, living in and around Lexington and western Kentucky, in that part known as the "blue-grass" region and the "pennyrile," I have never known a man of standing to be even charged with assassination. I have known but one instance in all that time where assassination was ever committed in that section of the country.

It is for that reason that we feel this anger now; it is for that reason that we feel this resentment now; it is for that reason that when this question is again discussed and when the bloody garments of William Goebel are unveiled before you, and when his memory is assailed by every species of slander, malignity, and hate, when falsehood does the work that assassination left incomplete—it is then that every Kentuckian, not only within the halls of Congress, but within the confines of my native State, feels the blood mount to his cheek and is ready at all times and under all circumstances, with his life if need be, to defend the sacred honor of his native State and the stainless courage and character of her martyred dead. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HITT. I now yield a minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in refutation of the position stated a short while since by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], I desire to refer the committee to the sixty-fifth United States Reports, in the leading case of the governor of the State of Kentucky against the governor of the State of Ohio. I read from the pertinent sections of the syllabus of the case:

5. It was the duty of the executive authority of Ohio, upon the demand made by the governor of Kentucky and the production of the indictment, duly certified, to cause Lago to be delivered up to the agent of the governor of Kentucky who was appointed to demand and receive him.

6. The duty of the governor of Ohio was merely ministerial, and he had no right to exercise any discretionary power as to the nature or character of the crime charged in the indictment.

7. The word "duty," in the act of 1793, means the moral obligation of the State to perform the compact in the Constitution, when Congress had by that act regulated the mode in which the duty was to be performed.

So it will be seen that it is a matter of "duty" and not a matter of "discretion," as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] wrongly stated the law.

The Constitution and this statute were intended to prevent the exercise of this right of might and prevent the wrong which the gentleman says the governor of one State has the right to visit on a sister State or States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few remarks upon a subject that appears to interest the Northwest particularly. In a speech delivered some time ago by my distinguished friend from Minneapolis [Mr. LIND] he took occasion to commend free trade with Canada, and more particularly to urge upon this House the importance of the free importation of wheat. I regret that I can not agree with my friend. I used to belong to his Congressional district, which he represented with so much credit to himself and his constituents—the old Second Minnesota. I followed his lead then with a great deal of pleasure. I would like to be able to follow him now. I know that he is supported by powerful Republican journals and large business interests whose favor I might like to court, but this is a subject to which I have given considerable thought and I feel that he is wrong, though his earnestness and sincerity made his plea very impressive. And while it would be much better to have some one who is better known and whose utterances would carry more weight express my views, still, as no one seems to have done so, I beg the indulgence of this House for a few moments while I give my ideas on the subject.

In the speech I refer to my friend [Mr. LIND] took occasion to say that it was absurd to contend that a tariff could have any effect upon the price of wheat, a commodity of which we export millions upon millions of bushels. This is the oft-repeated contention that our price is governed by the price in the so-called world's market, or the Liverpool market. This is not true to the extent generally contended. If the doctrine is true, the price of wheat in Minneapolis is the price at Liverpool less freight charges and expenses for placing it upon the Liverpool market. Let us see if that is true. Compare the cash price at Minneapolis with the price at Chicago and you will seldom find it more than 1 or 2 cents higher at the latter than at the former place. This is true, though Chicago is by rail (the only mode of transportation in winter) about 400 miles nearer to Liverpool than Minneapolis, and has 6 cents per bushel less freight to pay. Then, again, compare Minneapolis price with New York prices and you will often find only a slight difference, usually much less than the cost of transportation, not to mention elevator and other handling charges. This shows that the relative price at Minneapolis is much higher than at New York. The New York price is quite largely influenced by the Liverpool price, though even that is quite often as high as the Liverpool price. As to freight charges, James J. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railway Company, said in a recent speech that the freight charge from Minneapolis to New York on export grain was 25 cents a hundred, or 15 cents a bushel. The Bureau of Commerce and Labor says railway freight this summer from Chicago to New York has been 9 cents a bushel, while the freight charge from New York to Liverpool runs from 3 to 6 cents per bushel. This makes a total freight charge of from 17 to 21 cents per bushel, not figuring insurance, elevator, or other charges. Still, it is quite usual to find wheat only from 5 to 8 cents higher in Liverpool than in Minneapolis, and it is not so very uncommon to find the price the same. Test this question again in this way: Almost any market report from Minneapolis will show cash wheat and wheat from the same crop for future delivery about the same in price. In any market where the demand can readily be supplied, the price of wheat to be delivered in the future should be the cash price with storage and insurance added. Still, cash price in Minneapolis frequently exceeds the price for future delivery. Within the last few weeks prices for May delivery at New York and Minneapolis have been within 2 or 3 cents of each other, and I note in the Minneapolis Journal that prices in Kansas City, which is not affected so directly by our local conditions, have been 10 to 14 cents less than in Minneapolis, though the freight charges paid by Kansas City to place its wheat upon the so-called world's market is less than that paid by Minneapolis, showing the Minneapolis market at this time to be from 10 to 14 cents higher.

This situation has been frequently commented on in years past by the northwestern papers. It tends to show that there is a very strong competition for wheat in the Northwest. The Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce in its report, December 31, 1902, devotes considerable space to an argument against the tariff on the importation of Canadian wheat, and uses as its main argument the contention that the mills find it difficult to obtain a sufficient supply of wheat on this side of the Canadian border. I quote from this report:

Although full crops have been grown in the Northwest in late years, the millers find it more and more difficult to supply their wants.

Then again they say:

In the latter year considerable grain was brought in from outside sections, and with the increased production it follows that they (the millers) may be compelled to bring from outside sections not less than was brought in in 1901 or the mills will have to shut down from want of grain to grind. Millers understand this situation and are already anticipating it in paying premiums for cash wheat above the price of distant futures.

This situation exists to-day. The great banking house of Henry Clews & Co., of New York, in its review of trade conditions, December 19, 1903, says:

Leading authorities state positively that the problem of securing an adequate supply of wheat in the Northwest is a serious one.

The Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, in its report for 1902–3, has a similar complaint. No one at all familiar with the subject can deny the fact. The effect of it is admitted by my colleague [Mr. LIND]. He says it is true that the wheat in Minneapolis has generally been 4 to 5 cents higher than the general price.

There are many reasons for this situation. The principal market for the consumption of our surplus wheat is immediately south of the Great Lakes and in the North Atlantic States, it is there where you find the great industrial centers of this country, a busy hive of from twenty to thirty million people. This section produces but a small part of the agricultural products it consumes. It is the greatest market in the world and consumes annually from one hundred to one hundred and fifty million bushels of wheat. There are only three States east of the Mississippi—Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio—that produce any large excess of wheat above consumption. This surplus is only between forty and fifty million. It is winter wheat and enters the market in July and August, and is rapidly consumed or exported. Nearly all of it is disposed of before the spring wheat of the Northwest (which comes into the market in October and November) can be drawn on to supply this eastern market. The only other territory raising a surplus east of the Rocky Mountains is in the Southwest—Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, and Texas; but much of this territory, by reason of its distance, the same as the Pacific coast, is at a disadvantage in competing with the Northwest for the American market, which I have just described. Then, again, flour made from wheat raised in the Northwest enjoys a reputation for excellence of quality that creates for it a demand greater than that enjoyed by flour made from wheat raised farther south. The one reason why the Northwest can reach this large American market more cheaply than a large part of the southwestern wheat belt is that it lies close to Lake Superior and enjoys an exceptionally low freight rate over the lakes or railways competing with lake traffic.

For the purpose of this discussion it is not material to determine the causes that produce this keen competition and demand for wheat in the Northwest. The fact remains that competition inside the American market has been so keen in years past as to materially raise the price, a fact generally conceded by everybody.

Mr. LIND. Would it embarrass my colleague if I should ask him a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; go on.

Mr. LIND. Then, I ask the gentleman whether, in his judgment, it is not a good thing for our State and the Northwest that the price is as it is at Minneapolis—abnormally high?
